Children's shelters: Finances, parenting pivotal

Regarding the conditions at the DeKalb and Fulton County emergency children's shelters ("Don't wait for crisis to help children in shelters," @issue, July 22): I used to work in the Juvenile circuit. The families these children come from are like yours and mine. The problem is that the services available for them cost, and if you don't have insurance to cover those expenses, the problems aren't dealt with.

A second problem is that parental involvement is at a low. Most parents are too ashamed or are not knowledgeable about services available before the child is incorrigible. Then once the state takes over, the parents have no rights and are put on the back burner.

TACHELLE SHELTON, Clarkston

Some facilities meeting needs
For the Journal-Constitution

Thanks to The Atlanta Journal-Constitution for its recent editorial detailing the crisis in care at the DeKalb and Fulton county shelters.

While conditions in these state-run facilities are tragic, it is important not to lump all emergency shelters into the same category. The Gwinnett Children's Shelter, a private, nonprofit agency that has provided services to abused and abandoned youth since 1987, currently houses up to 26 teenagers, and soon will be opening a new home for eight children aged 5 through 11. Our services are designed to help children and youth come to terms with the trauma and abuse they have endured, and to teach them skills they will need to succeed.

Similar high-quality and comprehensive private, nonprofit programs exist in Cobb and Clayton counties, also generously supported by their local communities.

READER'S OPINION

Emergency shelters are a vital part of care for children and families experiencing crisis, violence and abuse. The Gwinnett Children's Shelter works with the state and local community to provide the best possible care.

NANCY FRIAUF

Friauf, of Buford, is executive director of the Gwinnett Children's Shelter.

Muslims: Groups spoke against terrorism

Khaled Abou El Fadl has shown that he must have been asleep in his UCLA ivory tower by not noting the plethora of Muslim organizations that condemned terrorism, especially here in Georgia ("U.S. Muslims lax in decrying terrorism," @issue, July 18).

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution is equally as guilty of promoting hatred and McCarthyism by accusing Muslims of not being patriotic enough.

ISSAM NASHASHIBI, Dawsonville

Ethnicity no way to base enemies

Regarding the letter asking why Arab profiling doesn't make sense ("What's puzzling about Arab profiling?" July 23), I offer statistical and historical reasoning.

There are more than 1 billion Muslims on Earth. If one were to take a vastly stretched estimate and say that there were 100,000 terrorists among these Muslims, you would still find only one terrorist per 10,000 Muslims. This doesn't even get into the fact that most Arab-Americans are probably even less likely to be a possible terrorist.

Historically speaking, the United States approximated this same profiling during World War II by jailing Americans of Japanese ancestry. As a general rule we now regard this as a large mistake, since the vast majority of these people were patriotic Americans. The greatest testament on this that I can offer is that my father fought and killed Japanese soldiers during WWII, yet he was friends before and after the war with Japanese-Americans.

One must differentiate between enemies and friends --- and ethnicity will never tell you that.

JEFF JOSEPH, Smyrna

Profiling tactics make sense

I wholeheartedly agree with the letter stating that we must profile people of the same background as our terrorist foes.

If the Irish Republican Army were at the root of our problems, I would expect to be looked at as a possible terrorist because I am a white male of Irish descent.

Let's not favor political correctness over human lives!

ROBERT WALLER, Cartersville

Lawbreaking CEOs should go to jail

The stock market plunge is one of the best things to happen to this country. It's sad we needed two wakeup calls.

Bill Clinton was too busy with women and scandals to pay attention to terrorists entering our country. He did nothing all those years while CEOs were cooking the books to give us a false economy. It has now come back to bite us. President Bush must make sure lawbreaking CEOs go to jail. If he does not, he should not win another election. It's also time for people to protect their money by putting more in the bank. They won't make as much, but the principal is protected.

READER'S OPINION

The stock market is a lottery. If you put the majority of your money in the stock market or in a 401(k), you have no one to blame but yourself.

RIC BURNETT, Doravill

Italy's symbolic gesture appreciated

The steps taken by the Italian government to return to Ethiopia the stolen Axum Obelisk are as important and symbolic as plans to create a memorial on the site of the World Trade Center.

As an Italian-American from New York City, I applaud the government of Italy.

It has been nearly 65 years since the obelisk was looted after Benito Mussolini's troops stormed the holy city of Axum, and irreparable damage has been done to the monument. I hope the damage to peace can be fixed.

NICOLA DeMARCO

DeMarco, a professor of social science in Oshakati, Namibia, serves on The Axum Obelisk Return Committee.

Building roads will add to problems

Gwinnett County Chairman Wayne Hill said, "I was elected to vote my conscience. We'll have 400,000 people moving into my county and we need to build every road we can" ("Gwinnett panel puts off vote on Arc to November," Metro, July 17).

I'm glad that Hill feels he needs to follow his conscience, but the main reason he was elected was to represent the people of Gwinnett.

As for the 400,000 people and building "every road we can," that type of thinking is exactly the cause of the congestion mess in metro Atlanta. Every road built in the north metro area will, at some point, dump that traffic onto one of the north-south roads (I-75 and 85, and Ga. 400 and 316), which all funnel onto I-285.

Our immense traffic problem robs us of time and air quality, and diminishes our quality of life.

GEORGE AUBREY, Cumming

Glover has made public housing safe

Regarding a recent letter suggesting that the policies established by the Atlanta Housing Authority under the direction of Renee Glover are hurting thousands of poor people ("Glover's policies hurting thousands," July 19): Obviously someone who would say that has never been to the public housing complexes of the "old" AHA, where nobody in his right mind would house his dog. It was high time common sense was used to establish order and make public housing residents aware of their responsibility for their apartments.

I applaud Glover for making public housing in Atlanta places where families can raise their children and feel safe.

For more than 26 years, I managed several properties that accepted Section 8 tenants. I can safely say that the rules established and enforced are the most important part of the current success of the new AHA.

KARIN S. BRYANT, East Point

Take nonviolent approach to ills

Jay Bookman is exactly correct --- nonviolent activities do work, and violence only begets more and more atrocities ("Naked threat exposes U.S. oil industry," @issue, July 18).

I hope this country adopts these methods to eliminate corporate abuse, scandal and enslavement, racism, jokes like our criminal (so-called) justice system and on and on.

The nature of the terrorists that threaten the United States and the rest of the Western world has changed in a fundamental way, and we must recognize that change and understand its implications to successfully combat terrorism and protect ourselves from it, said an expert who spoke at a recent think tank symposium in Washington.

Ralph Peters, a retired United States Army intelligence officer and author of "Beyond Terror: Strategy in a Changing World," spoke on June 26 at the Hudson Institute about how the views, opinions and actions of terrorists have changed, both historically and recently. Peters has served in and traveled to more than 50 countries -- what he calls "the broken parts of the world" -- with the Army and Marine Corps.

Called "one of the best military minds of his generation" by Newsweek magazine, his work -- which includes more than 14 books -- has acquired a devoted international following.

Peters acknowledges that while his judgments -- which are not based on library research but on "first hand observation and long-term thinking ... and a lifelong fascination with theology" -- may be wrong, they reflect things he has witnessed. "What we have seen, especially across the past decade, is a transition in the nature of terrorism and those people that threaten us."

According to Peters, there are two kinds of terrorists: practical and apocalyptic, with a large gray area in between. For decades, we dealt with the first type, but now we are faced with the second.

"These remain the two most useful classifications in attempts to understand and defeat our enemies who employ terror," he has written.

"We were used to dealing with practical terrorists (prior to Sept. 11)," he said. Because of this experience, "there was an assumption the hijackers would want to land the planes, take hostages, and make demands."

The practical terrorist -- the Irish Republican Army, the Red Brigades and Timothy McVeigh -- has political goals, he said. "However twisted their views are to us, they want to improve the world," said Peters. They want to remold the world to their liking, he said. The practical terrorist wants rewards on Earth, not in the afterlife.

A practical terrorist "does not want to die: they want to change the world, not destroy it," he said. "His or her concerns are external, they have to do with the plight of his or her people, real or imagined."

Kill apocalyptic terrorists, says expert

The apocalyptic terrorist is different: he has internal rather than external discontents, Peters says. This terrorist is unhappy with himself and blames others for his misery.

"... (N)o alteration in the external environment could sate his appetite for retribution against those he needs to believe are evil and guilty of causing his personal sufferings and disappointment," Peters writes. "For such men, suicidal acts have a fulfilling logic, since only their own destruction can bring them lasting peace. Above all, they need other humans to hate while they remain alive ..."

One of these internal discontents seems to influence the apocalyptic terrorist -- along with the practical terrorist -- more than any others. "I believe that the profoundest ... the most important, most irreconcilable difference between our society today -- the West and also the enlightened nations of the Far East, and the Arab Muslim world specifically, not the greater Muslim world -- has to do with the status of women," said Peters.

"Perhaps the most routine commonality between the practical and apocalyptic terrorist is the male terrorist's inability to develop and maintain healthy, enduring relationships with women ... The practical terrorist is more apt to idealize members of the opposite sex, who then disappoint him, and to imagine himself re-created as a storybook hero of the sort he believes would appeal to his fantasy woman," Peters writes. Timothy McVeigh, the Oklahoma City bomber, fit this model.

"...(T)he apocalyptic terrorist fears, despises and hates females," writes Peters, citing Mohammed Atta, the leader of the Sept. 11 hijackers, whose written testament, found during the investigation of the hijackings, "perfectly captured the Islamic fanatic's revulsion toward women."

The change in the role of women in modern times "is the greatest sociological change in all of known history, the transition of women from property to partner," said Peters. The entry of women into the education system, the work force and the military represented a change that "revolutionized the human efficiency of our society," Peters said. "This human efficiency of different races, religious groups, ages, and above all, different sexes ... is a phenomenal revolution."

"All this wed to two centuries of accelerating technological development involving everything from the electric toaster to biotechnology has created a society that transcends the notions of efficiency described by economists," Peters has written. "We are the transcendent society, the breaker of fixed systems and fixed rules. And that is the source of unprecedented strategic power," Peters wrote.

Human efficiency, he said, does not come from technological advances. Just because someone hijacks an airplane and uses a cell phone against you does not mean that they are part of an efficient or high tech society, he said. The use of a cell phone in such a case is a "parasitic use," Peters said.

"Technology is only an enabler, if an often impressive one. What matters are a nation's human resources," Peters has written.

"If women cannot fully participate in society, then that country or society is not going anywhere," Peters said. "The strategic implications (of women participating in society) are clear, they (apocalyptic terrorists) are going to continue to hate us more and more, for our success."

"Their failures are not our fault, " he added, and we are not able to change or fix their societies. We can help, but ultimately, he said, societies must change themselves.

"The world does not want rational explanations for its failures. Whether we think of individuals or entire cultures, they want someone to blame," he said.

Peters also pointed out the cynical manipulations of the leaders of apocalyptic terrorist groups. "If suicide bombing is so heroic and so important, why aren't the leaders of Hamas and other organizations strapping on bombs? Why aren't the middle aged guys strapping on bombs? They are very cynically ... identifying the most troubled young people, those who can be molded, and cynically turning them into rebels," Peters said.

Kill apocalyptic terrorists, says expert

The motivation for the Palestinian Authority and all the other terrorist groups is power, said Peters.

"When a man believes that God is whispering in his ear and telling him to kill, you are not going to be able to persuade him by whispering in the other ear," Peters said of apocalyptic terrorists.

Peters said that not all people can be reasoned with and this affects the way that they must be dealt with.

"Apocalyptic terrorists must be destroyed. There is no alternative to killing the hardcore believers, and it may be necessary to kill thousands of them, if we are to protect the lives of millions of our own citizens," Peters has written.

According to Peters, one of the most frustrating things about being a terrorist today is how hard it is to really hurt America.

"If on Sept. 11, the hijackers had hit only the Pentagon, much of the world would have cheered, and even our allies would have snickered," he said. However, when they attacked the World Trade Center, it was so graphic and visible that the whole world could picture it happening to them. And this, he said, is the how apocalyptic terrorists ultimately sow the seeds of their own destruction.

"The apocalyptic terrorist will always over-reach, they will always give the world a reason to react so forcefully that they will ultimately be destroyed," he said. They do this, he said, because they believe that they are God's messengers.

When apocalyptic terrorists speak about their goals, Peters said, do not listen to them. Many times, without even realizing it, they are being dishonest. Their real goal, no matter what they say their goal may be, is ultimately "to jumpstart Armageddon."

Obviously, they must be stopped, Peters believes. And the war on terrorist ignited by the Sept. 11 attacks must be pursued forcefully to accomplish that.

"What matters is that the world is getting an unexpected lesson in American resolve. It is the primary task of our present and future leaders not to let that resolve weaken," Peters has written. "The lesson must be lasting. And ferocity is the ultimate guarantor of peace." [end] Content: 11001000 12004000 16001000 16010000

She had read about the gruesome crime like every other Irishwoman. But only when she paid a visit to the shrine in the woods where the bodies had been found did Edna O'Brien decide to explore the tragedy by writing a novel about it.

"In the Forest," her 14th novel, already has set off howls of protest in Ireland for reopening the wound of one of the most disturbing nonpolitical crimes in its recent history: the 1994 killings of a 29-year-old single woman, her 3-year-old son and a village priest, all shot at close range. A young local man who had been released from prison recently was convicted of the crimes, then died in prison a few years later.

"This revisiting of unspeakably traumatic events is an unwanted and unjustifiable intrusion that can only do harm" for the victims' relatives and friends, wrote Fintan O'Toole last month in the Irish Times. He excoriated O'Brien for her choice of subject matter and her journalistic research into the crimes, which he said "did not and do not have a public meaning."

That contention perplexes O'Brien.

"You might as well have said the Crucifixion did not have a public meaning," she said from her home in London's Chelsea district. She called the criticisms leveled against her new novel "a form of moral vigilantism that has nothing to do with creative writing," but rather pertains to the history of censorship.

O'Brien, whom many critics outside her native country consider its greatest living writer, is no newcomer to controversy. Her first several books were banned there.

"I've always been drawn to the darker themes, as we call them," said O'Brien. "I have to laugh as I say that often they're stories people don't want told. They're more disturbing but they're dynamic and passionate, dealing with the deepest and very often the most covert passions."

O'Brien, who won the European Prize for Literature in 1995, in recognition of her body of work, was drawn to this chilling story by a sudden emotional identification with the victims, the perpetrator and their community. "It's always the unconscious that sends one to things, or that sends things to one," she said. "It's a little bit of a mystery to the self."

Six years after the murders, on a visit to County Clare in western Ireland, where she grew up, "by a piece of chance, I was brought to the forest," she said. "There's a little shrine there, where the woman and the child were slain, and a little over, a cross where the priest was found.

"It was lonely and haunted, silent except for the wind in the trees," she said, "and I felt that I must in my own way, and in fiction, tell the story of this woman, this child and this priest. It was as simple and, if you like, as truthful as that. I didn't set out to cause a furor." She pronounces the word fuh-ROAR, rolling the r's broadly.

The story's theme of sacrifice _ unwary victims searching for meaning as they confront death _ appealed to her. Eily, as the mother is named in the novel, "didn't invite the chance, God rest her, to endure victimhood. She was chosen from a thousand faces, arbitrarily," O'Brien said. She has said it is one of a literary novel's imperatives to ask difficult questions. "You find out the question in the course of writing it," she said.

Ageless questions

She has been asking such questions for a long time. She was born in the 1930s (she won't discuss her age) to a hard-drinking farmer who gambled away his 600 acres. She left Ireland for London in the mid-1950s. She eloped with Ernest Gebler, a divorced Czech writer more than twice her age, and they had two sons.

The intelligent, sexually questioning women in her first three novels _ "The Country Girls" (1960), "The Lonely Girl" (1962) and "Girls in Their Married Bliss" (1964) _ made her name but also brought her up against Ireland's conservative, Catholic, male establishment.

She left Gebler one night after dinner. Through most of the 1970s, her fiction chronicled unhappy marriages and dysfunctional families. "Few writers have written as astutely of the humiliation women suffer in relationships," said Eileen Battersby in a 1999 profile in the Irish Times.

Joe Dowling, artistic director of the Guthrie Theater in Minneapolis, was a leading light at the Abbey Theatre in Dublin when, in 1974, O'Brien's play "The Gathering" received its premiere there. A powerful tale of a family racked by violence and sexual tyranny in the home, it typified the twisted tales that made her unpopular in Ireland.

"Edna uncovered a very dark side of Irish life that people did not want to hear about," Dowling said. "At the time, people wanted to think we were all under the cloak of Mother Church, which would protect us. Now we find out there were other things going on under that cloak. Now it has become a cottage industry in Ireland to write about how awful your childhood was; if you had a happy childhood you are regarded as a freak. But Edna was the first."

While her poetry and widely praised short stories continued to be published in New Yorker magazine and elsewhere, O'Brien published no novels in the 1980s, when she was said by English publications to be involved in a relationship with a prominent politician.

Her novels of the past decade, like "In the Forest," have drawn on recent historical events and spun personal tales within a larger context of Ireland's sociopolitical troubles.

"House of Splendid Isolation" (1994) detailed an Irish Republican Army terrorist holding a woman hostage. "Down by the River" (1995) was based on Ireland's most famous modern abortion case. "Wild Decembers" (2000) explores ancestral grudges in an isolated western Irish village. "I offend by telling the unwelcome tale," she said, "and probably that has not changed."

Praise and scorn

She has earned high praise in the United States, where novelist Philip Roth has called her "the most gifted woman now writing fiction in English." Her editor at Houghton Mifflin, Pat Strachan, attributed O'Brien's popularity in Ireland on the dark side; When Irish eyes are reading, writer Edna O'Brien is often in trouble. Her books are no longer banned there, but her latest novel - bas....

this country to "the sense of urgency her prose creates _ always driving the reader forward _ and the coloration of the language that is unique to her. That vividness is more than a rich vocabulary or distinctive syntax."

In England, her reviews are more starkly varied between praise and acrid dismissals. Her following in Ireland has grown, and her books are no longer banned, but her recent drubbing in the press suggests that "the very bigoted and vitriolic aspect is the same," she said.

"This is a piece of fiction, written with as much dedication as I could possibly bring to any work," she added, "and that seems not to be on the agenda. That's a bit of a disappointment. I'm sure that I have stalwarts and even admirers there, but at the moment, it's the more scabrous and histrionic voices."

Said Dowling, "To some extent, it's a knee-jerk reaction to a sassy woman _ and she is one sassy woman, no question about it."

PHOTOGRAPHY walks many fine lines. Democratic and prolific by nature, it undermines old genius-at-work, precious-object ideas of art. At the same time, it keeps laying claim to art's special powers and perks. One of its traditional selling points is objectivity. Yet it's a medium of calculation: of measured light and chosen angles, of zooming in and editing out. These opposites define its tensions.

Such tensions can be felt even in an exhibition as anti-elitist and programmatically didactic as "Hidden Truths: Bloody Sunday 1972" at the International Center of Photography. The show doesn't pretend for an instant to be art. Most of its dozens of pictures are digital scans of umpteenth generation press prints, images made to be transferred to newsprint and valued for information, not formal finesse.

The pictures all have one subject: they are documents of a specific event at a certain place on a certain day. But in the context of the show they are also something less passive and more passionate than that. They are prosecution witnesses called to testify exactly how that event happened and who was responsible. They are pieces of legal, moral and emotional evidence on which ultimate verdicts of innocence and guilt rest.

"Bloody Sunday" refers to Sunday, Jan. 30, 1972, when an outburst of political violence erupted in the predominantly Roman Catholic city of Londonderry in British-ruled Northern Ireland. Derry, as Catholics call it, had been a center of political unrest throughout the decades of the so-called Irish Troubles. In the mid-1960's government troops patrolled the streets; a Catholic neighborhood that called itself Free Derry and was guarded by the Irish Republican Army declared its independence from British jurisdiction.

Around this time the Northern Ireland Civil Rights Association was formed, modeled on the nonviolent black civil rights movement in the United States. It organized mass demonstrations to demand equal rights in voting and housing. And in January 1972 it called for a march in Londonderry to protest government internment camps where people suspected of insurgent activities were being held without trial.

Thousands of people turned out, from international journalists to local citizens, including women and children, dressed in their Sunday best. A videotape made by one of the participants, William McKinney, suggests the event had a festive, upbeat feeling. To minimize the possibility of violence, the local branch of the I.R.A. had been asked to stay away.

The march was monitored, then disrupted by British paratroopers. As the demonstrators approached a barricade, armed soldiers sprayed them with purple dye and tear gas. Suddenly there was gunfire. The crowd scattered, but within minutes 13 men and boys, ages 17 to 59, had been shot dead; another man later died of his wounds. No soldiers were killed or injured.

The shots were heard around the world. The killings were front page news in Europe and the United States the next day. In Ireland the repercussions were explosive. Suppressed anger became overt. Violence increased. Families of the victims accused the British government of massacring unarmed citizens and demanded that the crime be acknowledged and punished.

Prime Minister Edward Heath responded by establishing a tribunal of inquiry that not only exonerated the soldiers but also suggested that their actions were provoked by demonstrators carrying guns and nail bombs. After the report was filed, families of the dead men campaigned to have the case officially reopened. In 1998, Prime Minister Tony Blair convened a new investigation. It is still in progress.

"Hidden Truths," which first appeared in 1998 and has traveled widely since, is an accumulation of forensic material pertinent to the case. Organized by the independent curator Trisha Ziff and the Bloody Sunday Trust and installed at the photography center by Brian Wallis and Kristen Lubben, it begins in no-nonsense narrative style with a sequence of photographs reconstructing the events of that afternoon: the march, the spraying of the crowd with dye and gas, the shootings.

As with any chaotic incident filmed rapidly and under extreme pressure with hand-held cameras, individual shots rarely tell a complete story. In a sequence of pictures by the Magnum photographer Gilles Peress that appeared in The Sunday Times in London, a man named Patrick Doherty is seen inching on his side along the ground, a white handkerchief tied around the lower part of his face.

He doesn't appear to be wounded; the handkerchief suggests he is trying to hide his face. Only a picture outside the sequence, of a medic hovering over his dead body, makes it clear that he was trying to escape the line of fire. And only pictures by other photographers reveal that handkerchiefs were worn as armbands by marchers and were later used as protection from tear gas. (Many of the photographs and a map of Londonderry are in a fascinating interactive computer data base in the show.)

Once photographs appear in print, their weight and meanings are up for grabs. This is evident in newspapers that appeared the day after Bloody Sunday, copies of which are in the show. The London Times report on the killings is cool; visuals are played down. In The Derry Journal the writing is openly accusatory; most of the space is given to pictures of the march, the victims, the grieving families and later of the funeral.

In the newspaper's presentation of photographs, the line between neutral information and editorial emotion is blurred. This is also the case in "Hidden Truths." As if to reinforce the evidentiary nature of its selection of photographs, the exhibition supplements them with physical objects intimately associated with the Bloody Sunday victims: a watch, a necktie, a notebook found in a pocket.

Some of these prosaic, aging things have been used as evidence in the investigations; boots worn by Patrick Doherty when he died were recently requisitioned for that purpose. But placed in exhibition vitrines they take on a reliquary aura, like the personal effects of saints. Their glamour transfers to the pictures around them, turning visual documents into icons. Elevation to iconic status is what turns photography into art, with all the ideological privilege and power of persuasion that implies.

There are, of course, no clear rights and wrongs in such transformations, unless maybe when commerce comes into play, which isn't the case here. (All the prints in the exhibition will be donated to a nonprofit Museum of Civil Rights being built in Londonderry.) Icons can be, after all, healing, communally binding things.

As an example, one might consider a photograph of a crowd at the Bloody Sunday funerals. It originally appeared in The Belfast Telegraph, and it's a remarkable picture. People as far as the eye can see look toward the camera; they form a kind of human landscape, a turbulent, turned-up field fading to a misty hill. The picture was taken in Londonderry on Feb. 3, 1972, but the faces -- grave, perplexed, stoical, unreadable -- could be from many other times and places, including Lower Manhattan in the last four months.

PHOTOGRAPHY REVIEW Is the Camera a Reliable Witness?

Indeed, all the tensions and ambiguities inherent in photography -- its factuality and its manipulateness, its accessibility and its pretension, its political passion and its ethical indifference -- are sure to make themselves felt in relation to the flood of images generated by the World Trade Center catastrophe and the war in Afghanistan. The International Center of Photography will contribute to the drama with a rotating exhibition called "Aftermath: Photography in the Wake of Sept. 11," which opens today.

"Hidden Truths: Bloody Sunday 1972" remains at the International Center of Photography, 1114 Avenue of the Americas, at 43rd Street, (212) 860-1777, through March 17.

At the end of 1914, during World War I, a strange, not to say miraculous, truce occurred in the trenches along the Western Front. For the most part, military historians say, the unofficial truces were initiated by German soldiers. Christmas carols were sung by troops in opposing trenches, unauthorized soccer matches were played in desolate no-man's lands, the dead were collected for burial and Christmas presents were exchanged.

At that point, there had been more than 800,000 casualties in the by-then five-month-long war. No one authorized the fraternization, and, of course, it was strictly illegal, perhaps even treasonable. Moreover, it did not affect the outcome of the war, which resumed after Christmas and dragged on for another four terrible years. But it happened.

The events of Christmas 1914 have become part of the mythology surrounding the Great War, as World War I was once known. In a sense, the spontaneous actions of the German, British, French and Belgian troops were the triumph of hope over experience, or even that of good sense over madness. But then, seemingly against the odds, the will to make peace can be as strong as that to make war.

As the year 2001 draws to a close, as we look back upon the dreadful events of Sept. 11 and the unfolding war in Afghanistan, the will to make peace may seem like that of an unprotected, flickering light in the gathering storm. As we cast our eyes around the world, we see the potential for catastrophe between India and Pakistan, the unending violence in the Middle East and the danger of the war against terrorism taking us into uncharted territory. But the light may be stronger than it first seems. Let us consider the world around us and welcome what little light there may be:

Northern Ireland: Against all odds, the Good Friday agreement of 1998 still holds. The Irish Republican Army has actually begun to turn in its arms, or "put them beyond use," in a process monitored by a neutral, outside authority. Sinn Fein, the political wing of the IRA, has resumed its role in the struggling new government of Northern Ireland, and in London, the British parliament has cleared the way for Sinn Fein to take its seats at Westminster if it so wishes (it doesn't as long as the rules require an oath of allegiance to the queen). But given the bloody history of Northern Ireland for the past 35 years, or indeed the ancient, tortured history of British-Irish relations, there has been remarkable progress. No doubt, there will be further terrorist incidents from splinter groups in both the nationalist and unionist camps opposed to a settlement. But the will of the great majority of people in Northern Ireland is for peace. And they will be heard.

The Middle East: It's the mother of all disputes. More than one thousand people have been killed since the Palestinian intifada began 15 months ago, the great majority of them Palestinian. But more than 200 Israelis have been killed as well, some of them in devastating suicide attacks, galvanizing the Israeli government, under intense popular pressure, into taking even further repressive measures against the Palestinians. Yasser Arafat, chairman of the Palestinian Authority, clearly has wished to use the intifada to bring greater pressure against the Israeli government to reach an equitable settlement. That hasn't worked. Arafat's apparent passivity regarding terrorist attacks by Hamas and Islamic Jihad, actions popular with impoverished and desperate Palestinians, has enraged Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, who is not slow to anger. In the face of united international pressure, rare in itself, Arafat has at last begun to crack down on Hamas and Islamic Jihad, at considerable political cost to himself.

Understanding your world: The signs of peace are there

But is it too late? The Israeli government has already declared that Arafat is no longer "relevant" in the situation. That's a ploy that will not work, especially as the United States and the European Union continue to recognize Arafat's authority, as do the vast majority of Palestinians. The Israelis need to talk to someone, and that someone remains Yasser Arafat.

At this point, we are as close to the bottom line as we are likely to get. Despite dozens of targeted assassinations, Israel is nowhere near to ending the uprising or the opposition of Hamas. That requires Palestinian cooperation. In other words, Israel has learned once again that there is no military solution.

Yasser Arafat, however, is faced with the stark reality that a continued intifada, and acquiescence in the face of terrorist attacks, will not break the Israelis. For its part, the United States has re-engaged in the Middle East peace process, however ragged that process may be. Moreover, the United States has at last declared itself in favor of an independent Palestine. That's good news not only for the Palestinians but for the entire process. Security talks already have resumed between the Israelis and the Palestinians, and if Arafat can keep a lid on Hamas, we may see more substantive talks in January.

Afghanistan and the war on terror: The war has gone remarkably well. We have rid Afghanistan -- and the world -- of an obscurantist government that visited great harm upon its people, especially women. It was a government, moreover, that had become a tool of Osama bin Laden's al-Qaida terrorist network, and therefore a danger to the entire world. At this point, we have not yet found bin Laden and are not sure if he is dead or alive. It is by no means a sure bet that we will ever find bin Laden, a worrisome prospect. Nor have we yet destroyed al-Qaida. But we are well on our way to doing so, and in this we have earned the support, sometimes grudging, of most of the world.

Moreover, there is now an interim government for the next six months, as well as a British-led international security force that may grow to some 5,000 troops. The escape of al-Qaida fighters into Kashmir, however, has the potential to escalate the often violent dispute between India and Pakistan. What we need to do is to proceed cautiously and forcefully, not expanding the war to such problematical targets as Iraq unless the evidence is overwhelming. The Iraqis suffer from both an oppressive government and a tough embargo. In the flush of victory in Afghanistan, the United States should not make their plight any worse.

India and Pakistan: In the wake of the militant Muslim attack on the Indian Parliament, in which 15 people were killed, relations between India and Pakistan are at the flash point. The situation is made worse by the infiltration of escaping al-Qaida fighters into Kashmir. In fact, the crisis between the two countries may be the most dangerous in the world at the moment. Both are nuclear powers with the ability to make a nuclear strike against each other. Pakistan is our vital ally in the war in Afghanistan, but India is the world's largest democracy and in the long run our more important strategic partner.

India now speaks of both war and peace in an effort to get at the terrorist bases in Pakistan from which the attack in New Delhi was carried out. So far, India has held back, and that's a good sign. If the will for peace is strong enough, this crisis too can pass. The memory of those troops in the trenches in 1914 is still with us.

Shock horror! A teenage boy finds leggy blondes attractive! He has been known to smoke the odd cigarette or two! He suffers from hangovers after boisterous parties! He loves cars and wants a motorcycle! He hasn't decided what he wants to do when he grows up!

The parents of most 19-year-old boys would be breathing a sigh of relief - "Phew, is that all?" But when the 19-year-old boy is second in line to the British throne, even the most commonplace of pleasures becomes whipped up into a frenzy of tabloid headlines.

Last week, Britain's Prince William found his life the subject of intense media speculation once more with the publication of a much-disputed book, "Diana's Boys: William and Harry and the Mother They Loved."

Among other things, the book portrays the young prince as a "one-man wrecking crew" among the girls. "Is Playboy Prince a Sex Machine?" screamed the tabloids, recalling for some early stories about his uncle Prince Andrew and - difficult as it may be to believe now - his own father.

Even the news that Diana's butler had been arrested for theft and that Queen Elizabeth is reported to be warming to the idea of a marriage between Prince Charles and his sweetheart, Camilla Parker Bowles, couldn't compete with new and juicy gossip about William and his brother, Harry, 16.

The Prince's Ladies

Author Christopher Andersen names William's closest girlfriends as glamorous English aristocrats Davina Duckworth-Chad and Emilia "Milly" d'Erlanger, and claims the prince has at the same time been enjoying a "steamy" e-mail correspondence with model and presidential niece Lauren Bush. (She denied this to The Washington Post in May.) Andersen claims there was plenty of "bed-hopping" in William's year off before college, when he visited Chile on behalf of the charity Raleigh International.

Spokesmen for the royal family reacted quickly, dismissing the claims as "utterly contemptible" and "ludicrous allegations." Andersen himself says the newspapers have blown it all out of proportion, and says he sees his book as a "tribute" to the boys and their mother.

College-Age Prince Attracts More Limelight

So, fact or fantasy? The one thing we can be sure about is that since his mother's death four years ago, His Royal Highness Prince William Arthur Philip Louis - or "Will Wales," as he has chosen to be known until he completes his education - has tried to tell us as little as possible about his life.

The British media have abided by a gentleman's agreement to stay away from William and Harry while they finish their schooling. But now that William is due to start undergraduate studies at the University of St Andrews in Scotland, that protection may dissipate.

Andersen's book, published in New York by William Morrow, isn't for sale in the United Kingdom, but quotes from it - and the palace reaction - have been published by media in Britain and elsewhere.

"There is an enormous fascination with William and Harry in America," royal historian and biographer Robert Lacey said. "It's thought of as on a parallel with John F. Kennedy Jr., but in fact it's even more than that. It's as if Marilyn Monroe had had children."

Interest in the young man whom unauthorized royal biographer Kitty Kelley has dubbed "half movie star, half rock star and ... probably the saving grace of the monarchy" is currently at fever pitch. When it was announced that he was going to St Andrews, admission applications rose by 44 percent - 90 percent of the increase accounted for by young women.

A Tumultuous Home Life

William and Harry, Diana once said, "are my one splendid achievement." The poignant sight of the two princes bravely walking behind their mother's coffin moved many. There were fears about what would happen to the two, who had lived most of their lives in the all-out verbal warfare that was their parents' failed marriage.

At 9, William was passing tissues under the bathroom door to soothe his sobbing mother; when Harry was 9, his father went on national television to discuss his infidelity with longtime mistress Parker Bowles. Diana was revealed as a bulimic self-harmer who had had affairs herself; Charles coldly shut himself away from his wife's grief. Royal watchers speculated that it would be a surprise if the boys turned out even halfway normal, coming from a family that one journalist called "the maddest since the Munsters." And all that was before their mother's life was tragically cut short.

Four years later, Andersen's book and other press reports make the princes sound far more than halfway normal (with the proviso that these, like most "inside" revelations from the palace, are basically uncheckable). They are close to their father and have accepted his relationship with Parker Bowles. William and Harry are devoted to each other, even if Harry is determined to outdo his older brother on the ski slope and polo field.

Of course, there are the inevitable rumors about William's love life. Andersen claims that in Chile, more than once "William's bodyguards reportedly looked the other way while he was locked in a passionate embrace with a female volunteer." Andersen also suggests William was seen spending the night in a tent with two women, "one blonde, one brunette."

Kelley, appearing on "Larry King Live," summed up what many might have felt when she retorted: "Christopher, I think you'd have a worldwide exclusive if you told us that this glorious-looking young man joined a celibate Benedictine monk abbey."

Not that there haven't been more serious risks. Five high-profile aristocrats in William's circle have been caught taking drugs - among them Tom Parker Bowles (Camilla's son) and Tara Palmer-Tomkinson (the daughter of close friends of Charles) - but there's no suggestion William has used drugs. The worst that's been said is that he had a massive hangover after one New Year's Eve and that he apparently smokes, a habit that Andersen speculates would have enraged his mother.

College-Age Prince Attracts More Limelight

Andersen also claims that in the last year William has been at the center of as many as 20 security scares involving such terrorist groups as the Real IRA, a radical offshoot of the Irish Republican Army. The severity of these threats is as yet unclear.

Focused On Tradition

But, said Lacey - author of "Royal: The Lives of the House of Windsor," to be published next year to commemorate the queen's Golden Jubilee - for all the tales of nightclubs and wild living, the real William is very different. A military career is by far the most realistic option, he believes.

"He's a very traditional straight kind of guy," Lacey said. "It's often forgotten that he began his gap year [between high school and college] with the Welsh Guards in Belize. He likes that sort of thing. And the army would give him the privacy he wants."

Andersen reports that William told one volunteer: "I rather like American girls. ... I can easily see myself marrying one." But most royal watchers in Britain say he's far more likely to stick with "his own sort" - aristocrats he's known for years - terrified as he is that he could be set up by the press. William is said to have a real disdain for the media. Two years ago, he skipped a skiing vacation rather than face intrusion by the paparazzi.

"My own particular reading of the situation is that the queen and Prince Charles are very permissive," Lacy said, "and that the boys have responded to that by taking on the traditional aspects of the royal family, happy to take on their duties and at ease with their destiny."

There is a mind-bending illogic behind the Bush administration's decision yesterday to withhold $34 million from the United Nations Population Fund, which is working in China despite continued practices there of coerced abortion and sterilization. It is precisely because of China's reprehensible policies that the U.N. presence is important. Cutting off funds to the agency is an inexcusable sop to right-wing anti-abortion activists in an election year. It will increase the number of abortions worldwide by depriving poor women of the education and help they need and that the U.N. agency provides.

The U.N. Population Fund is the world's biggest agency focused on women's reproductive health and the only serious external force in China trying to change the way local officials hold down population growth. Last year Secretary of State Colin Powell praised its "invaluable work." Faced with accusations that the agency was complicit in Chinese misdeeds, the administration sent in a study team in May. It found no evidence that the fund knowingly supports or participates in any Chinese program that coerces abortion or sterilization. It recommended that the $34 million requested by Congress for the agency last year be released.

Instead, the administration refused yesterday to do so because of China's continuing birth-control practices. This means that some 12.5 percent of the agency's budget is now wiped out and that vital and worthy programs like midwife training in Algeria and a new AIDS center in Haiti are suddenly without funding they need.

The administration says it will give the $34 million instead to the Child Survival and Health Program Fund, part of the State Department's Agency for International Development. The problem is that that agency cannot duplicate the work of the U.N., which operates in dozens of countries where the United States has no aid presence. Reproductive health and freedom of women are central to the improvement of poor societies. The U.N. Population Fund is one of the most important forces at work today helping poor women. The United States should be supporting it, not undermining it.

Recent events have led some people to predict that one of the world's most repressive regimes may be growing a bit less so. The generals who rule, or misrule, the Southeast Asian nation of Burma, which they call Myanmar, released from house arrest the woman who should in fact be the nation's prime minister, Aung San Suu Kyi. They have allowed her to travel a bit, and they have released from unspeakable prisons a few of her supporters. Grounds for hope, you might think.

What U.S. newspapers are saying

Then came release of a report, documented in horrifying detail, of how Burma's army uses rape as a weapon of war. The rapes take place as part of the junta's perpetual -- and, outside Burma, little-noticed -- war against ethnic nationalities, in this case in Shan state. The Shan Human Rights Foundation and Shan Women's Action Network documented 173 incidents involving 625 girls and women, some as young as five years old, taking place mostly between 1996 and 2001. Most of the rapes were perpetrated by officers, in front of their men, and with utmost brutality; one-quarter of the victims died.

What is telling is the response of the regime to the report. Rather than seeking to bring the criminals to justice, it has unleashed vitriol against the human rights organizations, accusing them of drug-running and the like. ... Burma's leaders cannot bring the criminals to justice because they are the criminals.

Later this month Secretary of State Colin Powell will travel to the region for meetings with senior officials. Earlier this month he instructed his diplomats to express outrage over the reported use of rape as a tactic of war; he should personally express the same outrage. He also should make clear that Aung San Suu Kyi -- whose democratic party won an overwhelming victory in 1990 elections that the junta nullified -- should be permitted more room to maneuver: permission to publish a newspaper, for starters. The Burmese regime should not receive rewards for cosmetic liberalization.

The Irish Republican Army says it's sorry. The statement comes more than a bit late, but the apology ought to hold some value.

The IRA statement represented the group's first unmitigated apology for the deaths of hundreds of civilians since the late 1960s. The group issued the apology in advance of last weekend's 30th anniversary of a coordinated series of IRA bombings in Belfast that claimed nine lives.

To be sure, the IRA has committed a horrific number of atrocities. IRA violence has killed approximately 650 civilians among a total of some 1,800 people who have died at the organization's hands.

The IRA also said its members "acknowledge the grief" caused to surviving relatives of slain security force members and members of paramilitary organizations. Unfortunately, the IRA chose to refer to police and military victims as "combatants." To the extent that description is true, the IRA, as the prime perpetrator of the armed conflict, is largely responsible for drawing them into combat roles. The apology for civilian casualties nevertheless deserves welcome. It is a sign of progress in a conflict whose religious and ethnic roots also give pain to Americans, who have deep ties to Ireland and the United Kingdom.

Irish and British leaders greeted the statement with varying levels of acceptance and skepticism. Still, an expression of regrets certainly beats the relentless, remorseless self-justifications that accompany cycles of violence elsewhere.

If the IRA can keep its implied commitment to peaceful conduct, the apology will serve as a legitimate sign of hope about other conflicts. As America's World War II generation has demonstrated so admirably, reconciliation can follow even the most deadly warfare.

The recent 14th annual International Conference on AIDS held in Barcelona offered the world some very grim numbers, and compelling reason to do more to reduce them.

The conference reported that about 40 million people worldwide are infected with HIV, the virus associated with AIDS. Perhaps 3 million of these will die over the next 12 months. That's 9,000 AIDS deaths each day. Add those to the 20 million people who have already died of the disease. An estimated 45 million more people will be infected by HIV/AIDS by 2010.

Numbers like these leave no room for doubt about the horrifying scope of this growing global pandemic. AIDS is ravaging sub-Saharan Africa, where most countries lack the money, health care systems and infrastructure to fight it effectively. Millions of Africans are already doomed to die of AIDS. Many more millions -- HIV infection rates in some African countries reach 30 percent of all young adults -- will die unless something effective is done. Moreover, AIDS is spreading elsewhere, too. India, China and Russia each are believed to have rapidly growing rates of infection. None has more than a rudimentary capability to treat those infected and slow the rate of new infections. ...

The United Nations has established a Global Fund to combat AIDS. The U.N.'s goal is $10 billion a year in contributions. Current contributions are less than a third of that amount. Congress and the Bush administration are prepared to appropriate $900 million for the Global Fund, which sets a credible example for other affluent countries. But money alone isn't a sufficient answer to the growing AIDS threat. Donors, international health experts and the poorer countries with the greatest AIDS problem need a strategy first.

After Barcelona, there can't be any doubt about how desperately one is needed.

With the nation's capital already on peak alert for terrorists, reports of a nearby invasion by alien fish capable of walking on land have rattled nerves in Washington this summer. So much so that, on Tuesday, the Bush administration is expected to announce a ban on imports of the finned beasts.

And now, as if to discourage Washingtonians from fleeing westward to escape the onslaught, comes word that a huge fish named the bighead carp, which devours so much food that it squeezes out more desirable fish, threatens to invade Lake Michigan in big numbers.

And you wonder why some people never leave the beach for the water.

The first of these unsettling critters, the northern snakehead, has the head of a serpent, the scales of a fish and the teeth of a barracuda. It can gobble up other fish, then walk on its long pectoral fins to the next pond, lake or river. Some wags have wondered whether the reptilian Frankenfish, first spotted on June 30 in a Maryland pond, might reach the nation's capital and live unnoticed among similarly troublesome lawyers, lobbyists, politicians and cable TV talk show hosts.

The snakehead is native to the Yangtze River region of China. Wildlife officials say two of the fish were obtained by a Maryland resident who dumped them into the pond two years ago after their appetites grew too large for his wallet.

Now Maryland officials face who-knows-how-much expense to get rid of snakeheads before the hungry fish crawl to the potential feast that awaits them only 75 yards away in the Little Patuxent River, which flows into Chesapeake Bay.

Interior Secretary Gail Norton is scheduled to ban the importation of 28 species of snakehead, which have been found in six other states. (No word on how this will be received by people in Thailand and Myanmar who reportedly believe each snakehead is a reincarnated sinner.) ...

With luck, wildlife experts will figure out how to eradicate the snakehead and keep the bighead carp from advancing farther north. The nation is better off with such invaders put in a hot pan with some lemon juice and a pinch of garlic.

What U.S. newspapers are saying

As for the fright these two fish have caused here on land, it could be worse. A year ago, we were all cowering in fear of shark attacks.

Reports say government investigators would love to question Zacarias Moussaoui, the so-called 20th hijacker, about the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks.

More importantly, they'd like to know what he knows about future attacks still in the works and the al Qaida chain of command. They might get the chance.

Moussaoui, 34, capped months of bizarre behavior last week by suddenly volunteering that he was an al Qaida member and that he wanted to plead guilty to federal terrorism conspiracy charges. U.S. District Judge Leonie Brinkema refused to accept the plea and gave Moussaoui a week to reconsider.

The exchange set observers to chattering about Moussaoui's true intent -- as well as his sanity. ...

Any kind of plea agreement would require a proffer, a detailed summary of what Moussaoui could give in exchange. Having already plea bargained in the case of John Walker Lindh, the so-called American Taliban, government officials should tread carefully in any negotiation with this sworn enemy of the United States.

The Irish Republican Army, the most murderous terrorist group in Northern Ireland's three decades of civil conflict, delivered a stunning message last week: "We offer our sincere apologies and condolences" to the families of the thousands of civilians killed and injured as a result of the IRA's actions.

The apology alone won't guarantee lasting peace where Catholics and Protestants have been warring for centuries. But it does suggest an important lesson that bodes well for the Good Friday peace process underway. "The process of conflict resolution requires the equal acknowledgment of the grief and loss of others," the IRA apology said. "We are endeavoring to fulfill this responsibility to those we have hurt."

Terrorism by any other name is still terrorism. Even worthy ends do not justify torture, bombing and killing of civilians. Such violence breeds only more violence and hate. The scars left behind become barriers to national reconciliation.

Northern Ireland's Catholic minority has had legitimate complaints, which explain the group's separatist aspirations. Most in the Protestant majority wish to remain a part of Britain. Paramilitary groups from both sides have waged bloody battle since 1968. But a shaky cease-fire has been in place for five years. As the IRA message said, "The future will not be found in denying collective failures and mistakes, or closing minds and hearts to the plight of those who have been hurt." Whatever the motive, the IRA offered welcome acknowledgment and hope for an eventual end to the violence.

New York Newsday

The Bush administration has built a questionable reputation abroad for backing out of international treaties it doesn't like. Even when U.S. objections are valid, they carry the taint of go-it-alone-ism at a time Washington is seeking international cooperation in the war on terror.

Now comes another well-intentioned international treaty that the United States will be obliged to shun. The irony is that it would actually further U.S. national goals to join it, if it weren't for a constitutional roadblock.

What U.S. newspapers are saying

The draft treaty, released last Friday by the U.N. World Health Organization in Geneva, would set international standards for controlling the supply and marketing of cigarettes. It's a key part of WHO's campaign -- including education and curbs on tobacco smuggling - to discourage smoking across the globe in an effort to reduce tobacco --related deaths, estimated to reach 10 million annually by 2030.

The centerpiece of the proposed treaty is a ban on cigarette advertising and sports sponsorships by tobacco companies, to be enforced by the governments of all signatory nations. And here is where it gets sticky for the United States. Unlike most other nations on earth, this country's Constitution has free speech guarantees that extend, with some limitations, to commercial speech. That includes advertising. The government has pressured the tobacco industry to limit the content of its ads and curtail their appeal to young people. But most of those strictures are voluntary. Imposing a total ban on cigarette ads would be challenged on constitutional grounds, and Washington would be in a position of signing a treaty it could not enforce. That would be hypocritical.

Granted, American tobacco companies have a vested interest in weakening the treaty; their markets are growing abroad. But perhaps other nations might take heart in the example that the United States has been setting in ostracizing smokers, barring them from the workplace, restaurants and public areas - without any formal ban on ads.

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette

Committees in both houses of Congress are scheduling hearings on the Bush administration's military intentions toward Iraq, and not a moment too soon. Absent an attack on the United States that requires an immediate response, no American president should be able to take the country to war without the permission of the Congress acting in the name of the people.

A war with Iraq would be an awesome undertaking. Some 550,000 U.S. troops, supported by 31 allies, were involved in the 1990-91 war, which did not even evolve into a full-scale invasion of Iraq. Such a war would line up most Arab states against the United States. No European country -- even Britain -- is enthusiastic about such a war.

For European nations, the priority is the Arab-Israeli conflict, not Iraq. A French official told The New York Times last week that "the important thing is to build a coalition for peace in the Middle East, not to build a coalition for war in Iraq."

Also skittish is Turkey, a U.S. ally whose support would be necessary for a successful operation against Saddam. On Sunday, Turkish Prime Minister Bulent Ecevit warned the United States that "it will not be possible to get out of there that easily. President Bush is a friend of Turkey. We do not want to hurt his feelings, but it is our duty to make our concerns known."

The only country that enthusiastically supports a U.S. attack on Iraq is Israel. A war with Iraq would take the heat off Israel to resolve its problems with the Palestinians as Israel became an ally in a new Middle Eastern war. ... Whatever the genesis of the drumbeat for an Iraq war, hearings to be held by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and the House International Affairs Committee before the end of the summer are critical. Such proceedings are necessary if even a semblance of popular support is to be established for a war against Iraq.

What is breathtaking in the preparations for those hearings so far is the refusal of the administration to agree to send its officials to testify before the committees. What could possibly make them imagine that they can take the country to war without even telling the public why?

FBI Seeks Hackers in Web Attacks

WASHINGTON (AP)

The FBI sought to question several hackers today in its investigation into last week's attacks against major Web sites, looking for people known by their Internet screen names "coolio," "mafiaboy" and "nachoman." At a White House meeting on Internet security with technology experts, President Clinton described the electronic attacks as a "source of concern". Participants at the meeting said they discussed ways to improve security on the Internet, how to protect powerful "server" computers from hackers who install attack software and use the servers remotely to overwhelm major World Wide Web sites.

Georgians Regroup After Tornadoes

CAMILLA, Ga. (AP)

Residents in southwest Georgia spent the day sifting through rubble after tornadoes ripped through towns early yesterday and killed 22 people. President Clinton declared disaster areas in four counties Colquitt, Grady, Mitchell, and Tift _ making federal funding available to help people and business owners recover from the storms. The Insurance Information Institute estimated that the total damage of the Georgia storms was $25 million. It was the state's worst toll from twisters since 1936, when 203 people were killed.

Republicans Ready for S.C. Debate

COLUMBIA, S.C. (AP)

John McCain and George W. Bush geared up today for their final debate in make-or-break South Carolina. McCain told an audience in Irmo, S.C.: "I'm as interested in how this campaign is judged as I am in winning or losing. I've always had a sense of history." Bush used his own appearances to announce his plan to overhaul campaign finance. A USA Today/CNN/Gallup poll published today showed Bush leading McCain 49 percent to 42 percent, just above the margin of error. A Los Angeles Times poll had the two in a statistical dead heat.

Clues Sought in Littleton Shootings

DENVER (AP)

AP Top News at 7 p.m. EST Tuesday, Feb. 15, 2000

Investigators worked to identify a suspect today in the killings of two Columbine High students at a sandwich shop, where a surveillance camera failed to capture the shootings. Jefferson County sheriff's investigators were trying to identify a motive and a suspect in the Subway killings. Spokesman Steve Davis declined to say whether a weapon was found. The shop is about two blocks from Columbine, where two teen-agers fatally shot 12 fellow students and a teacher before killing themselves in April.

Anti-Smoking Ads Pulled Over Taste

NEW YORK (AP)

The organization created to mount the biggest U.S. anti-smoking campaign ever has pulled two of its first four edgy commercials after complaints arose from the world's biggest cigarette maker, a TV network and some state attorneys general. One of the pulled ads showed young people stacking "body bags" on the sidewalk outside a tobacco company building, while the other showed teens equipped with a lie detector trying to get into a tobacco company's offices to quiz sales executives about smoking's addictiveness. The ads are part of a $1.5 billion anti-smoking campaign being financed with proceeds from the industry's huge 1998 settlement with the states over claims for reimbursement for treating sick smokers.

'American Beauty' Tops Oscar Nods

BEVERLY HILLS, Calif. (AP)

"American Beauty" led all films today in Oscar nominations with eight, including one for Best Picture. Two other best picture nominees, "The Insider" and "Cider House Rules," have seven nominations apiece. The ghost story "The Sixth Sense," last year's biggest box-office surprise with $278 million, received six nominations, including one for 11-year-old Haley Joel Osment for supporting actor.

Dow Ends Up 198.25

NEW YORK (AP)

A rally in oil and some bargain-hunting buoyed the stock market today with blue chips helping to pull technology shares out of a severe slump. The Dow Jones industrial average rose 198.25 to close at 10,718.09. On the NYSE, gainers led losers 1,551-1,490. The Nasdaq, which tumbled as much as 127 points earlier, closed up 2.22 at 4,420.77.

Women's Soccer League Gets $40M

NEW YORK (AP)

Saying it has raised $40 million from cable television companies and has the support of the U.S. World Cup champions, a group plans to start a women's soccer league of 8-10 teams in April 2001. Among the eight investors putting up $5 million each are Time Warner Inc., Comcast Corp., Continental Cablevision Inc. and Cox Communications. Each investor will have the right to operate one or more franchises. They also would get the local television rights. Salaries will average $40,000 for a five-month season starting in April. The cities will be selected from among a pool of 15 the group is considering, and the projected average attendance is 6,500.

Bush, McCain To Debate Tonight

COLUMBIA, S.C. (AP)

Republican presidential hopefuls John McCain and George W. Bush face their final debate tonight before the make-or-break South Carolina primary. McCain hopes for a win to show his 18-point victory in New Hampshire was no fluke. Bush wants to show he still deserves the front-runner's mantle. Bush won the leadoff Iowa caucuses and last week's Delaware primary, but McCain didn't campaign in either state and polls have shown some of Bush's South

Clinton Worried About Heating Oil Costs

WASHINGTON (AP)

President Clinton said today the federal government is willing to give more help to families "that are really getting hurt" by the soaring cost of home heating oil in New England and the Middle Atlantic states. So far, the government has released $200 million from the Low Income Home Energy Assistance Program. "We can release more," the president said. Clinton said the government's heating oil assistance eases the burden of the poorest families, "but there are a lot of working people on modest incomes that are just getting killed by this, because of their reliance on home heating oil."

Plea Deal in Border Arrest

MONTPELIER, Vt. (AP)

A Montreal woman linked to a group of Algerians thought to be plotting a bombing in the United States was ordered freed today after prosecutors said she had cooperated with investigators and had no knowledge of any terrorist activities. Lucia Garofalo, 35, agreed to plead guilty to two immigration charges transporting an alien into the United States and conspiring to transport aliens. She is likely to be sentenced to six to 12 months in prison. Garofalo had been held since Dec. 19, when she tried to enter Vermont from Canada with an Algerian man.

Abortion Rights Group To Help Gore

WASHINGTON (AP)

Angry with Bill Bradley for making abortion rights an issue in his Democratic presidential bid against Al Gore, leaders of a major abortion rights group said they would place ads, make phone calls and walk door to door to convince voters to support the vice president. The National Abortion and Reproductive Rights Action League, which never before endorsed a presidential candidate during the primaries, pledged today to put its more than 300,000 members and its resources behind Gore now and in the general election if he wins the nomination.

IRA Pulls Out of Disarmament Talks

BELFAST, Northern Ireland (AP)

The Irish Republican Army withdrew Tuesday from disarmament negotiations, dealing a blow to hopes of resurrecting Northern Ireland's Protestant-Catholic power-sharing government. In a hard-line statement, the IRA also formally withdrew from the table its latest hint that it might someday disarm. The outlawed group accused the British government and the province's major Protestant party, the Ulster Unionists, of pursuing "a military victory," something that "cannot and will not happen." The development underscored the failure of a 3-month-old deal brokered by American diplomat George Mitchell.

'American Beauty' Tops Oscar Nods

BEVERLY HILLS, Calif. (AP)

"American Beauty" led all films today in Oscar nominations with eight, including one for Best Picture. Two other best picture nominees, "The Insider" and "Cider House Rules," have seven nominations apiece. The ghost story "The Sixth Sense," last year's biggest box-office surprise with $278 million, received six nominations, including one for 11-year-old Haley Joel Osment for supporting actor.

Dow Ends Up 198.25

NEW YORK (AP)

AP Top News at 7 p.m. EST Tuesday, Feb. 15, 2000

A rally in oil and some bargain-hunting buoyed the stock market today with blue chips helping to pull technology shares out of a severe slump. The Dow Jones industrial average rose 198.25 to close at 10,718.09. On the NYSE, gainers led losers 1,551-1,490. The Nasdaq, which tumbled as much as 127 points earlier, closed up 2.22 at 4,420.77.

Women's Soccer League Gets $40M

NEW YORK (AP)

Saying it has raised $40 million from cable television companies and has the support of the U.S. World Cup champions, a group plans to start a women's soccer league of 8-10 teams in April 2001. Among the eight investors putting up $5 million each are Time Warner Inc., Comcast Corp., Continental Cablevision Inc. and Cox Communications. Each investor will have the right to operate one or more franchises. They also would get the local television rights. Salaries will average $40,000 for a five-month season starting in April. The cities will be selected from among a pool of 15 the group is considering, and the projected average attendance is 6,500.

Bush, McCain Face Off in Debate

COLUMBIA, S.C. (AP)

GOP presidential campaigners John McCain and George W. Bush faced off tonight in their final debate before the important South Carolina primary. The 90-minute debate was sponsored by the South Carolina Business and Industry Political Education Committee. It was being televised live on CNN with Larry King as moderator. A USA Today/CNN/Gallup poll published today showed Bush leading McCain 49 percent to 42 percent, just above the margin of error. A Los Angeles Times poll had the two in a statistical dead heat.

Father Asks Reno for Elian's Return

HAVANA (AP ) Increasingly frustrated by his son's extended stay in the United States, Elian Gonzalez's father has sent Attorney General Janet Reno a letter demanding the boy be returned to him right away. Juan Miguel Gonzalez's second letter to Reno in as many weeks was published in Cuba today. In the letter, Gonzalez says he does not recognize the jurisdiction of the U.S. court system, which is weighing an attempt by 6-year-old Elian's Miami relatives to block his return to Cuba. In his first letter earlier this month, Gonzalez pressed Reno to return the boy to him. He said that in the meantime, his son should be placed with Manolo Gonzalez, another great-uncle in Miami.

Israel Eyes Change in Pullout Plan

JERUSALEM (AP)

Israel will consider making minor changes in an overdue troop withdrawal from the West Bank, officials said Tuesday, but rejected handing over suburbs of Jerusalem to the Palestinians. Talks between Israel and the Palestinians broke down earlier this month after Prime Minister Ehud Barak refused to budge on the terms of a 6.1 percent West Bank troop withdrawal that was to have taken place by Jan. 20. It was not clear when talks would resume. Israel radio quoted the chief Israeli negotiator, Oded Eran, as saying talks between the sides would resume next week. According to the report, which could not be immediately confirmed, the resumption of negotiations would coincide with the visit of U.S. peace envoy Dennis Ross.

Death Row Inmates Prefer Injection

TALLAHASSEE, Fla. (AP)

Not one of Florida's death row inmates has chosen the electric chair over injection since the state changed its primary method of execution last month. The electric chair, previously the state's sole execution tool, had seen a decade marked by flames shooting from the apparatus in two executions and blood flowing from a man's face in a

Rae Carruth Faces Death Penalty

CHARLOTTE, N.C. (AP)

Prosecutors want the death penalty for ex-NFL player Rae Carruth. With Carruth and his mother in court, the prosecution said special circumstances warrant the death penalty for the former Carolina Panthers player. Carruth and three others are charged with first-degree murder in the drive-by shooting of his girlfriend. Cherica Adams was shot four times while driving on Nov. 16.

Bush, McCain Trade Charges

COLUMBIA, S.C. (AP)

GOP rivals George W. Bush and John McCain swapped charges of negative campaigning tonight in a close quarters debate, their final clash before the South Carolina presidential primary. The rapid back and forth between the two men on CNN left the third contender, Alan Keyes, to complain about the tone. "Is this the kind of pointless squabbling we really want them to see," he said. The live audience applauded. McCain stunned Bush, the national front-runner, two weeks ago with a landslide victory in New Hampshire's primary, and South Carolina shapes up as a pivotal test for the two men.

Metal, Cyanide Warning in E. Europe

BELGRADE, Yugoslavia (AP)

Serbia warned on Tuesday of dangerous metal concentrations in an East European river already contaminated by a cyanide spill. The Agriculture Ministry said laboratory tests showed considerably increased iron and copper levels in the Tisza river, where the cyanide spill has wiped out virtually all life. The cyanide poured into streams from a containment dam at a gold mine near the Romanian town of Baia Mare on Jan. 30. The World Health Organization earlier had expressed concern that heavy metals such as lead and cadmium also might have escaped into the water, posing potentially a far greater health threat.

$6.9B Computer Research Bill Passes

WASHINGTON (AP)

The House passed a $6.9 billion measure today aimed at expanding the government's role in computer and scientific research and maintaining the nation's role as a technology leader. The bill would almost double the amount spent on technology research last year. Over the next five years, it would funnel millions more into research projects that include ways to speed up the Internet and how to integrate computing and medical research. It would authorize the money to be spent over the next five years by several agencies, including the National Science Foundation, NASA and the Environmental Protection Agency.

Texas Fugitive Sought in Nebraska

LUSK, Wyo. (AP)

Police and National Guard troops with night vision equipment searched a secluded area by foot and helicopter today for a Texas survivalist wanted in the killing of a farmer and the wounding of two law officers in Nebraska. Lt. Carl McDonald of the Wyoming Highway Patrol confirmed that Charles Lannis Moses Jr. was in the area, but he said it appeared Moses had given police the slip again. Moses, a 31-year-old construction worker, has been the subject of a three-day manhunt that began in western Nebraska. He was spotted in Lusk today.

No.6 Mich. St. Beats No.7 Ohio St. 83-72

EAST LANSING, Mich. (AP)

AP Top News at 7 p.m. EST Tuesday, Feb. 15, 2000

Sixth-ranked Michigan State took over sole possession of first place in the Big Ten as Morris Peterson scored 26 points and pulled down 11 rebounds in an 83-72 win over No. 7 Ohio State tonight. This was the 25th straight win at home for the Spartans (19-6, 9-2), who are attempting to win a third straight conference regular season title. Scoonie Penn scored 30 points for Ohio State (17-5, 8-3), which fell into a tie for second in the conference with Indiana and Purdue.

Bush, McCain Spar at Debate

COLUMBIA, S.C. (AP)

George W. Bush and John McCain swapped charges of negative campaigning tonight in a close quarters debate, their final clash before the pivotal South Carolina primary. "You should be ashamed," the Arizona senator lectured his rival. "Don't compare me to Bill Clinton," Bush snapped back. The two men and Alan Keyes also clashed over abortion, taxes and campaign finance and found common ground on foreign policy in a 90-minute encounter, but the debate crackled when the topic turned to negative campaigning. McCain stunned Bush, the national front-runner, two weeks ago with a landslide victory in New Hampshire's primary. South Carolina will be an important test for the two men.

FBI Probes for Hackers

WASHINGTON (AP)

The FBI sought to question several hackers today in its investigation into last week's attacks against major Web sites, looking for people known by their Internet screen names "coolio," "mafiaboy" and "nachoman." At a White House meeting on Internet security with technology experts, President Clinton described the electronic attacks as a "source of concern" but shunned a comparison to an "electronic Pearl Harbor." Participants at the meeting said they discussed ways to improve security on the Internet, how to protect powerful "server" computers from hackers who install attack software and use the servers remotely to overwhelm major World Wide Web sites.

Clues Sought in Littleton Shootings

DENVER (AP)

Investigators worked to identify a suspect today in the killings of two Columbine High students at a sandwich shop, where a surveillance camera failed to capture the shootings. Jefferson County sheriff's investigators were trying to identify a motive and a suspect in the Subway killings. Spokesman Steve Davis declined to say whether a weapon was found but said the store's camera did not capture the crime.

Wards Seized at Italian Hospital

ROME (AP)

Police have seized three wards at a private psychiatric hospital in Sicily, where more than 100 patients were allegedly found in filthy conditions. State television aired video shot by police agents posing as repairmen which showed emaciated patients at Villa Stagno hospital in Palermo. The footage showed some patients in urine-soaked beds, a kitchen with rotting food, excrement-smeared floors. There was no hot water. Prosecutor Marzia Sabella called the scene shocking and said the owner and managers were being investigated for patient abuse and neglect.

Tokyo Stocks Fall

TOKYO (AP)

The benchmark 225-issue Nikkei Stock Average shed 46.67 points to 19,321.16 on Wednesday. The Dow Jones industrial average rose 198.25 to close at 10,718.09.

Cavaliers Beat Spurs 92-81

CLEVELAND (AP)

Lamond Murray scored 27 points, rookie Andre Miller had 20 and the Cleveland Cavaliers began the second half with a shocking 92-81 win over the San Antonio Spurs tonight. The Cavs, coming off an injury-filled 19-30 start to the season, snapped a four-game losing streak by outhustling the defending NBA champions. Shawn Kemp had 14 points in 28 foul-plagued minutes and Mark Bryant had 10 rebounds for the Cavs, who started a hobbling Brevin Knight at point guard and were without Bob Sura.

Taxes, Abortion Hot Topics at Debate

COLUMBIA, S.C. (AP)

In their final clash before the pivotal South Carolina primary, John McCain, George W. Bush and Alan Keyes sparred over negative campaigning, abortion and taxes. McCain stunned Bush, the national front-runner, two weeks ago with a landslide victory in New Hampshire's primary, and South Carolina shapes up as a pivotal test for the two men. The state votes on Saturday, and recent polls point to a close contest. Bush runs strongly among registered Republicans in the surveys, but McCain gains strength from independents, who are permitted to vote.

Private Co. To Help Keep Mir Alive

LONDON (AP)

A Bermuda-registered company said Tuesday it has reached an agreement to lease Russia's Mir space station in a last-ditch effort to keep the orbiting platform alive. MirCorp, which was formed in December, already has paid $20 million to $30 million to the station to keep it up in space at least through the summer, said its president, Jeffrey Manber. He said another $40 million would need to be raised to keep the station afloat through the end of the year and beyond. Mir has been flying without a crew since August, and heavily indebted Russia had said it would abandon the station next month unless private investors came up with funding.

According to a report in the London Daily Telegraph, Secretary of State Colin Powell has instructed U.S. State Department officials to cease making use of the expression "the peace process."

This is one of a number of indications that the Bush administration will be a lot cooler in its dealings with Northern Ireland than the Clinton administration was.

For example, where Clinton gave large and exuberant parties on St Patrick's Day, with singing of Irish patriotic ballads and the participation of Sinn Fein, the political wing of the Catholic nationalist paramilitary Irish Republican Army, President George W. Bush will spend next St. Patrick's Day at his home in Texas.

It looks as if St. Patrick's Day celebrations in Washington this year will be confined to Congress, and mainly the House of Representatives and will be largely Democratic affairs. This is hardly surprising. The Irish vote in the United States is always mainly a Democratic affair.

The Irish vote in the presidential election went overwhelmingly to former Vice President Al Gore and Democrats in Congress worked hard to bring out that vote. Only a few Republicans publicly supported "the Peace Process" and one of these publicly advised Bush to "accept defeat" when some polls seemed to be going against him in the long count. So Bush owes the "Irish" lobby in America precisely nothing and it is clear that Bush himself is well aware of this.

Of course, it is theoretically possible that Bush may seek eventually to mend fences with the "Irish" bloc. He is already mending fences, to good effect, with black voters and women through the pattern of his appointments and in other ways.

Both blacks and women are two huge voting blocs that went against Bush in the last election. It makes sense to try to win round as many as possible of that vote for the next time around and also for the Congressional elections due in less than two years time.

It may seem to make sense to try a similar effort with the "Irish" vote. But I don't think Bush will be in any hurry about that.

Irish eyes are not smiling at Bush

The black vote and the women's vote are of great importance throughout the United States. The "Irish" vote significant though it may look from here, is of comparatively little national importance in the United States. It bulks large in New York and a little less large these days in Boston and its environs.

Elsewhere, in the South and West and in Middle America, it is of hardly any significance. And in a few places where the "Irish" vote does exist, it is solidly Democratic and likely to remain so.

So Bush has no pressing need to woo the Irish and it shows in the way the president intends to spend St. Patrick's Day.

It is true that Irish Foreign Minister Brian Cowen is of a different opinion or at least professes a different opinion. After a meeting with "the top U.S. policy advisers" in Washington, Cowen expressed confidence in Bush's commitment to the Irish Peace Process.

According to a report in the Dublin newspaper, the Irish Independent, on Thursday, "President Bush has indicated a general personal interest in Northern Ireland," said Cowen after his morning meeting with national security adviser Condoleezza Rice at the White House.

"The minister said, contrary to some previous assertions, the Bush administration and the current U.S. president are prepared to offer "the prestige of the office" to help in the process. "I was heartened, genuinely heartened, by what I heard today," he added."

Curiously, the expression "heartened" is actually weakened by the addition of the words "genuinely heartened."

Cowen sounded as if he didn't think his audience would believe his "heartened" and tried to strengthen it with that propitiating "genuinely."

All serious political observers will have noted that Cowen had not actually met the president whose position he felt so heartening, and that the putatively supportive president will be spending St. Patrick's Day in Texas.

How much difference will the shift in the relations of the U.S. president to the Irish Peace Process actually make?

In the short term it will not make any marked difference, but the effects of the shift over a period of time will be significant. The shift goes deeper than the matters I have already noticed. The Republicans are tougher on organized terrorists and guerillas than the Democrats have been.

Under Bush, the United States has attacked radar sites in Iraq and have induced the British to follow suit and they are likely to be less impressed by the fact that the IRA guns are mostly silent for the moment than by the fact that the guns are all still there. I don't think that while that is still the case the Sinn Fein leaders will be showered with invitations to the White House.

The shift in the position of the White House will be felt quite quickly in Britain. It will tend to weaken still further the cross-party consensus on Northern Ireland that had already been getting a bit shaky over matters like "police reform." Those in the Tory party who are already suspicious about that supposed reform are likely to voice their suspicions more firmly now that they know the United States is no longer wholeheartedly behind the Peace Process of which Sinn Fein is the most conspicuous part.

And when it is found that the IRA is no longer flavor-of-the-month in Washington, the IRA will begin also to be less acceptable in the Republic of Ireland.

The idea of forming a new Irish coalition government along with Sinn Fein, with which Ireland's ruling Fianna Fail Party has been dallying for many months now, will no longer look so attractive, once Sinn Fein/IRA's international acceptability has been tarnished.

Irish eyes are not smiling at Bush

And a version of "police reform" in the North whose most ardent partisans are Sinn Fein/IRA will begin to look a little dicey. It may take a bit of time for all that to sink in. In particular, illusions about the police reforms in the North recommended by former Hong Kong Gov. Chris Patten still appear to be rife.

About the Patten-based reforms the Irish Times wrote at the end of an editorial on Wednesday that these reforms "are well ahead of anything else to be found in the European Union and light years in advance of what prevails in this state."

If that is so, I hope we remain "light years" behind the Patten-inspired "reforms". The mere prospect of the implementation of these reforms has already decimated the higher ranks of the RUC and is known to have demoralized the force at all levels.

The idea of encouraging Catholics to join the predominantly Protestant RUC is right in itself. But the reason why Catholics don't join is that they are afraid of the IRA which is strong in the areas where Catholics live.

And the IRA have made it clear that they will not advise Catholics to join even a police force over which the Patten reforms in their full original state have been imposed. What Sinn Fein/IRA wants is not police reform but the replacement of normal policing by "devolved authority," by which they mean the installation of paramilitary rule over most of Northern Ireland.

And with the aid of a number of well meaning liberals, the IRA now seem well on the way to attaining that objective. Just possibly, a changed approach, beginning in Washington, may come in time to avert that disaster.

Harry Benson's the guy who shot that famous picture of the Beatles having a pillow fight. At the time, Benson was fresh on the assignment to document the rock group, and he kept at it for more than two years, right through the Beatles' last U.S. tour in 1966.

Benson, who was born in Glasgow in 1929, came to the United States with the Beatles in 1964 and has lived in New York ever since. Less than a year after he stopped taking pictures of Fab Four antics, he was shooting for Life magazine, and during the next 35 years he captured a remarkable gallery of images. He was on hand for the Irish Republican Army hunger strikes and the falls of Czechoslovakia and the Berlin Wall. Even before joining Life, his portfolio included shots of President John F. Kennedy riding in a convertible with French President Charles de Gaulle and of a dead man in the street during the 1965 Watts riots.

Benson was invited by Jackie Kennedy to photograph her daughter Caroline's wedding. He has photographed writers Aleksandr Solzhenitsyn and Truman Capote, Russian President Boris Yeltsin and every U.S. president since Eisenhower. He was not, however, invited to capture Greta Garbo at the beach; that photo is one of his rare paparazzo endeavors.

Benson has twice been named Magazine Photographer of the Year by the National Press Photographers' Association and twice received the Leica Medal of Excellence. Once There Was a Way: Photographs of the Beatles (Harry N. Abrams, 2003) is the most recent in a series of books featuring his pictures. Harry Benson's America will be published in 2004.

Pasatiempo caught the veteran lensman at home in New York City in early November.

Pasatiempo: This new Beatles book has some great photographs.

Harry Benson: It's amazing that it all began 40 years ago and they still have a tremendous impact. They crossed all boundaries. To begin with, I didn't want to do the job, and it turned out to be one of the best things I ever did because it brought me to America.

Pasa: You worked for Life until a year ago. It's too bad that magazine is gone.

Benson: It's coming back. It will be a weekly, like Parade magazine, and some of the people that worked on the monthly will be back with it.

HARRY BENSON; HERE, THERE AND EVERYWHERE

Pasa: You're shooting for Vanity Fair and The New Yorker these days?

Benson: Yeah, and the London Sunday Times. I just did a piece on Robert McNamara and I worked on a good story about Belle Glade, which is near Palm Beach, and a lynching that could have happened there.

Pasa: You're off to Florida this weekend?

Benson: I'll be photographing a boxer, a Nicaraguan that nobody wants to fight because he's so good, and he smokes and drinks and chases women during his training.

Pasa: When you first started using a camera, shooting weddings as a kid in Glasgow, were you using a 35 mm or a Speed Graphic?

Benson: The Speed Graphic would be like the space shuttle compared to what I was using. It was a VN and it had no rangefinder, and you had to guess distances. That's what a lot of the press photographers used then. Between weddings I got a job with the local newspaper, the Hamilton Advertiser. That's the paper David Livingstone sent his dispatches to from Africa. He had made a little chapel in the darkroom there where he would pray.

Pasa: How did you get to work for the Daily Express in London?

Benson: That took a while, to get there. First

I was with the London Daily Sketch covering Scotland. That was a great job, traveling around Scotland when I was in my mid-20s, but none of this was my ambition, really, when I was growing up. My ambition was to play in goal [as in soccer] for Scotland, and only a month ago I realized it wasn't going to happen.

So the Sketch brought me to London after I won an award, and I worked on Fleet Street. I gate-crashed a party and the son of the proprietor of the Express saw me. I suppose he thought I was very enterprising, getting in like that.

Pasa: You seem to have been in the right place at the right time to get some amazing pictures.

Benson: I think if there's a good picture, you have to show energy to get it, else you waste your time. It's not a 9-to-5 job, not a genteel job, and it's not like I'm specialized in fashion or sports, although I've done that too.

I always looked for the center of the story. Speed was everything. You know, if you're slow, you can watch rigor mortis setting in your subject. If I'm photographing a president, I have an hour, maybe a half hour, and if I can get him walking 10 yards one way, that's 10 yards he has to walk back. You want to keep them moving.

I was next to Bobby [Kennedy] when he was shot, and I'm very proud I covered civil rights; there aren't many of us left who did that.

Thank God the Express made me do that job with the Beatles in Paris. I was ready to go to Africa. I thought myself a big-time journalist, and who wants do a rock group? There are things in my life I would like to go back and do over again, but the Beatles isn't one of them. I got them in all these situations, a good variety, basically everything you could think of. Some things I just don't want to think about. I'd like to have spent more time around Martin Luther King.

Pasa: Are there assignments that are favorites in your memory?

Benson: The Beatles are way up there. You couldn't write a history of the last century without mentioning them right at the top, and it's not just the music. They had a tremendous impact on our culture, and I'm glad I was very close to them at the beginning.

HARRY BENSON; HERE, THERE AND EVERYWHERE

You didn't know what was going to happen, and neither did they. Ringo was talking about maybe getting some money and starting a hairdressing shop, and George was wanting to be a classical guitarist, and Paul and John thought of maybe doing something in West End musicals.

It was interesting, in Paris, the first time they went abroad together, and they had their music going and it was really something. You could literally watch the swell of enthusiasm building from day to day. I was with them the night they were told they were no. 1 in America [for "I Want to Hold Your Hand"] and that they'd be on Ed Sullivan. That was where the pillow-fight picture came from.

Pasa: And you wanted to play soccer.

Benson: When I was a boy, there was a poem by Robert Louis Stevenson about a boy traveling in a train and looking out the window, and he sees a cow and a farmer, a man waving a stick, a beautiful field, and he passes the railway station and there was a piece of it, "in each a glimpse and gone forever," and that's what I think my photography was and is. That piece always stuck in my mind.

I think one of the reasons I went for news photography was that I actually grew up in the war. We got bombed in Glasgow at one time for a few months; they were after the shipyards. Those were very dramatic times, and I was hopeless at school -- I was always going to the movies. I had to leave when I was 13.

Photography to me was a way out. It was very pure: all I had to do was take good pictures, and I would become the heavyweight champion of the world. There was nothing intellectual about it: That's a good picture; that's a bad one. That's all there was to it.

"This is the Sinn Fein headquarters." Bill Rolston has pulled his car over about 20 yards from a modest red-brick building that bears the name of the party that is the political wing of the outlawed Irish Republican Army. Looming above, on the building's side wall, is an enormous portrait of a gentle-eyed man, with flowing dark hair and a red sweater. A spatter of white drips down from his chin.

"You see, it's got a white paint bomb?" Mr. Rolston gestures at the blotches. "That's relatively recent."

He waves towards gray streaks just below the portrait. Those, he explains, are left over from an earlier paint-throwing that was patched up just hours before an important march. The culprits were probably young hoodlums who decided to defile Bobby Sands, the IRA hero pictured here. Sands died in prison in 1981 after a 66-day hunger strike.

Mr. Rolston turns on the ignition and swings back onto busy Falls Road. Now it is off to more murals in this heavily republican, working-class neighborhood. An especially striking one is dedicated to 17 people who died from plastic and rubber bullets used by the police. Their faces smile out from 17 cream-colored bullets, which look like so many oversize corks. Another, in a neighborhood further along, shows a woman who is painted in red and holding a gun, with smaller portraits memorializing local women who died fighting for the IRA.

Driving around Belfast with this easygoing sociology professor from the University of Ulster's Jordanstown campus is like taking a crash course in the dismal and complicated politics of Northern Ireland, which is divided between those who would like the region to rejoin Ireland (nationalists) and those who would like it to remain a part of the United Kingdom (loyalists). In studying murals, Mr. Rolston has made it his business to know the city's neighborhoods intimately. "Nationalist," he will say, and then, "Loyalist," waving a hand at what appear to a visitor to be identical row houses and corner shops on either side of the same street. Down a block, the street sides may be "nationalist, nationalist" or "loyalist, loyalist" -- and sometimes even divided between factions of loyalists.

Belfast's extremists, especially the loyalist ones, often use flags and painted curbsides to mark their territory. But the most ubiquitous form of political representation is murals. Painted on the sides of houses or shops, or on roadside walls, the brightly colored images in effect serve as political advertising. Few, if any, appear in well-to-do areas, but in the working-class neighborhoods of Belfast and other Northern Irish towns, they are inescapable.

"Our gallery is the streets; we try to get our message out to the biggest audience," says Danny Devenny, a muralist who once belonged to the IRA and began painting while in prison. Mr. Rolston finds him on a Friday morning about a half-mile west of downtown Belfast, working with a colleague on a mural that he explains is a celebration of the local (nationalist) community. It shows a neighborhood woman, a church, contented schoolchildren, a tin-roofed school, and what will probably be a horse, though its face is yet a great brown blob.

The scene is peaceful enough to make a latter-day Impressionist smile. But Mr. Devenny's words betray little good will toward those who believe Northern Ireland should remain part of Britain. Clutching a coffee cup in paint-spattered hands, he says of loyalist mural painters, "Just because we use the same medium doesn't mean that we have anything in common."

Mr. Rolston first became interested in murals in 1981, when he was a young lecturer at Ulster. Until that time, he explains, few republican murals existed. As for loyalist murals -- some of them nearly 100 years old -- they were so much part of the cityscape that "I wouldn't have more thought of photographing a loyalist mural than I would of photographing a tree."

Thirteen years into what the long-suffering residents of Northern Ireland call "the Troubles," the death of Bobby Sands and nine other Republican hunger strikers protesting their status as criminals (rather than prisoners of war) prompted a burst of republican murals. In the course of two months, 150 of them appeared around the city, according to Mr. Rolston. He began photographing them as a hobby.

"After the hunger strike was over, they didn't stop," he recalls. "The republicans kept painting murals, so I kept photographing." The republican proliferation caused him to look with fresh eyes at the loyalist murals, and he began photographing them, too. In the intervening years, Mr. Rolston probably has built up the world's biggest image archive of murals in Northern Ireland, and especially Belfast.

"He's completely kept track of the nuances that the murals have broadcast to the world," says Mary Hickman, head of London Metropolitan University's Irish Studies Center. "For an academic, it's been an unusually close relationship with what's happening on the ground."

Graduate students from as far away as Germany and the United States who are doing mural-related projects constantly call him up with questions, as do conference organizers. But Mr. Rolston still considers mural-watching his hobby, albeit one "that's got out of control."

"I don't go down very obscure postmodernist or cultural-studies channels trying to deconstruct these things," he says. Still, his work on murals is a useful complement to other parts of his research on globalization and mass media. He has written about truth-telling in political trouble spots, racism in Ireland, and how the news media represent political conflict.

Mr. Rolston's latest book, Drawing Support 3: Murals and Transition in the North of Ireland (Beyond the Pale Publications) argues that even after the loyalists declared a cease-fire in October 1994 (following an IRA cease-fire the same year), their murals remained heavy on military imagery. A drive through loyalist neighborhoods in Belfast confirms the often-chilling nature of the murals, which tend to be commissioned by paramilitary groups. Many show masked men or guns; a few show the brooding insignia of the Red Hand Commando, which Mr. Rolston describes as a "small group of crazies" connected to a loyalist paramilitary group.

Some do show more benign images, such as the smiling faces of Queen Elizabeth II and her mother. Mr. Rolston says that pressure is rising on loyalists to tone down their murals. Pausing by one painting that juxtaposes ominous-looking armed men with more benign portraits of fallen fighters, he explains that it is part of a loyalist paramilitary group's "attempt to come to terms with people saying, 'Look, you can't paint men with guns and hoods forever.'"

On the more peaceful side, a handful of loyalist murals have sprung up celebrating the Ulster Scots, people from mostly Protestant Scotland who moved to Northern Ireland centuries ago and sometimes continued on to the United States. One, on the side of an eatery advertising Turkish kebab and pizza, features a portrait of James Buchanan, the 15th American president. The accompanying quotation reads, "My Ulster blood is my most priceless heritage."

A Watcher of Walls

In contrast to loyalist murals, Mr. Rolston argues, republican ones have become markedly less menacing since the IRA reinstated its 1994 cease-fire in 1997, a year before the Good Friday Agreement, which created the Northern Ireland Assembly, its members drawn from across religious lines. References to armed struggle have mostly been eliminated, with guns now appearing mainly in memorials to dead comrades. Republican murals, Mr. Rolston says, also comment more on current political developments than loyalist murals.

Mr. Devenny himself is proud that his mural-in-progress, a peaceful scene from the life of the local community, has "nothing to do with politics." He denounces the loyalists for using imagery that he says is designed to "intimidate their own community."

In more than two decades of photographing murals, Mr. Rolston has felt his stomach lurch only a few times. Once, a man shouting, "Hey, fellow, come here" made him uneasy, so he quickly left.

Another time, he had driven up to a loyalist mural that had a green circle with a red line through it -- meaning Catholics should stay away. Undeterred, Mr. Rolston, who describes himself as a "card-carrying lapsed Catholic," was about to snap a picture when a police officer drove up and ordered him firmly to leave.

For safety, he observes two rules. One, learned from a photographer friend in Dublin, is to stay in the open when taking pictures. "If you start hiding, you get people being suspicious of you," he explains. The other rule is to stay clear of areas where there has just been violence, giving them a few days to calm down. Even so, he realizes that photographing the colorful symbols of the Troubles does not quite have the feel of front-line work. "It's not exactly like war photography in Bosnia or anything, you know," he says with an easy laugh. "I have no horror stories to tell."

Health impact is sought in collapse of towers

From executives to food cart vendors, people who were near the World Trade Center when its twin towers collapsed began enrolling Friday in a registry to help determine the long-term health effects of breathing the soot-filled air.

Health officials hope to collect information from up to 300,000 people believed to have been near the twin towers during and shortly after the Sept. 11, 2001, attack.

Data collection began Friday, and a preliminary report is expected this fall. Plans for the registry were first announced last year. Health officials said the registry was not launched in response to recent accusations that the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency gave misleading assurances about air quality in the days after the terrorist attack.

Judge rejects dismissing charges against Nichols

A judge refused to dismiss state charges against bombing conspirator Terry Nichols on Friday but said he would grant defense attorneys' request to move the trial outside Oklahoma City.

State District Judge Steven Taylor said he would announce the site of the trial Monday.

Taylor ruled that pretrial publicity in the case was not enough to deny Nichols a fair trial. Researchers testifying for the defense had said media coverage of the 1995 bombing of the Oklahoma City federal building and Nichols' federal conviction made it impossible to pick a fair and impartial jury in Oklahoma.

"I have faith in the system," Taylor said. Although he agreed to move the trial, he said he lacked the authority to move it out of state as Nichols' attorneys had requested.

Judges refuse to delay recall vote on governor

NATION / WORLD DIGEST

A panel of federal judges said Friday that it would not postpone California's gubernatorial recall vote, removing one of the last legal barriers to the Oct. 7 election.

The decision came the day after the U.S. Justice Department made a formal determination that Monterey County's hurriedly assembled balloting plans for the election to unseat Gov. Gray Davis did not constitute a violation of the federal Voting Rights Act. Justice Department spokesman Jorge Martinez said Friday that federal officials had signed off on Monterey County's recall arrangements.

The three federal judges last week had delayed their decision on two lawsuits filed by the Lawyers Committee for Civil Rights and the Mexican American Legal Defense and Educational Fund in anticipation of guidance from the Justice Department.

Another legal challenge to the recall election is still pending in the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. That suit, filed by the American Civil Liberties Union, challenges the use of punch-card ballots in six counties. A hearing is scheduled for Thursday.

Malpractice is ruled out in physician's affair

A family doctor did not commit malpractice by having an affair with a patient's wife, a judge ruled.

Common Pleas Judge Sandra Mazer Moss dismissed a suit brought by a patient who said he told Dr. Jonathan E. Ostroff in a 1998 office visit that he was having marital problems that were causing him anxiety.

Ostroff neglected to tell Walter Long about his affair with Long's wife, Roseanne, according to the suit. The couple divorced the following year, according to the judge.

Many jurisdictions have recognized that a sexual relationship between a psychiatrist and a patient can constitute malpractice, but the judge said there was no therapist-patient relationship between the family doctor and either of the Longs.

Writer-musician is named to national arts council

President George W. Bush has nominated James McBride, composer, saxophonist and best-selling writer, to a six-year term as a member of the National Council on the Arts.

The council gives advice on policies and programs to the government's National Endowment for the Arts, which makes awards to stage, musical and other artistic groups. Membership on the council is subject to confirmation by the Senate.

A former writer for The Boston Globe and The Washington Post, McBride is known for his best-selling memoir "The Color of Water - A Black Man's Tribute to his White Mother," which has been widely translated and put on school reading lists. His latest book is a novel, "Miracle at St. Anna."

McBride, 45, has received the Richard Rodgers Award of the American Academy of Arts and Letters for his work in the musical theater and has written music and lyrics for Anita Baker and Grover Washington Jr. He wrote the score for the hip-hop musical "Bobos."

NATION / WORLD DIGEST

Brian Cooley, 29, admitted that he pushed Seaman Lisa Tedstone, 30, out a sixth-floor window at the Milford Plaza Hotel on Oct. 5, 2002. They had checked into the room with a third sailor after a night out in New York. Police have said Cooley was annoyed that Tedstone refused to sleep in his bed.

Cooley will receive a 12-year prison term when he is sentenced Sept. 23. He was initially charged with second-degree murder and faced as much as 25 years to life if convicted. Cooley, from La Porte, Ind., and Tedstone, from Simpsonville, S.C., were assigned to the amphibious assault ship Wasp, which had docked in New Jersey after a deployment near Afghanistan.

Woman gets 15 years in daughter's drug death

A woman who used heroin with her teenage daughter was sentenced to 15 years in prison for the girl's death from an overdose.

Debra Gatlin Clair, 49, was convicted last week of manslaughter in the death of 15-year-old Tiffany at Clair's apartment in 2001. Clair was sentenced Thursday.

The death came about a week after Tiffany was released from a mental hospital, where she had been treated because of a drug habit and a suicide attempt.

According to testimony, mother and daughter used the heroin with Bradley Ray Waltermire, the son of Clair's former boyfriend. Waltermire, 23, also has been charged with manslaughter.

COSTA RICA

Volcanic eruption causes panic but no evacuation

The Arenal Volcano spewed lava, rocks and ash Friday in its strongest eruption in more than two years, panicking nearby residents.

The lava flows were on the unpopulated north and northwest slopes of the 5,388-foot mountain, said Rodolfo van der Laat of Costa Rica's Seismological and Vulcanological Observatory.

Authorities said there was no need to evacuate the hotel that houses visitors from around the world who visit the park around the volcano, 75 miles north of San Jose, the capital. The volcano has been intermittently active since 1968.

LIBERIA

West African forces try to stop rural fighting

West African peace forces said they would move into Liberia's volatile interior as early as today to quell unrest and stop the flight of tens of thousands of civilians to the capital of Monrovia.

The move north will mark the month-old peace mission's first sizable deployment into the country's most volatile spot, since the landing of the peace force Aug. 4 and the Aug. 18 peace deal.

The peace mission helped end 2 1/2 months of rebel sieges of Monrovia, which were lifted after President Charles Taylor resigned and flew into exile in Nigeria on Aug. 11.

Although Monrovia is calm, forces loyal to Taylor have attacked villagers in the northwest, forcing the people in the area to flee.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Reputed IRA dissident is charged in car blast

An alleged Irish Republican Army dissident arrested on suspicion of involvement in Northern Ireland's deadliest car bombing was charged Friday with conspiring to cause explosions and possessing explosives.

The 34-year-old man was expected to be identified publicly at his arraignment today. He has been interrogated for the last three days about the Aug. 15, 1998, attack on Omagh, which killed 29 people and wounded more than 300.

The attackers had hoped to derail the 1998 Good Friday peace accord, which proposed power sharing and scores of other goals designed to promote reconciliation between Northern Ireland's British Protestants and Irish Catholics.

NATO -- Russia and NATO agreed Wednesday to renew their "basic relationship" after a year of strained ties over the NATO bombing of Yugoslavia and Russia's military operations against secessionist rebels in Chechnya. "We are renewing our basic relationship," Russian Foreign Minister Igor Ivanov told a Moscow press conference. "We consider each other as important strategic partners in guaranteeing security in Europe and the world." The comments came after NATO Secretary-General Lord George Robertson of Britain met Russia's Acting President Vladimir Putin. In his first foreign policy speech as acting president two weeks ago in Moscow, Putin signaled that he wanted an improved partnership with the West. He is the odds-on favorite to win Russia's March 26 election to find a permanent replacement for former President Boris Yeltsin, who resigned on New Year's Eve. The meeting came after Russia completed its long and costly re-conquest of the Chechen capital, Grozny. 0-

IRELAND -- Northern Ireland's crumbling peace process looked close to final collapse Wednesday after Gerry Adams, president of Sinn Fein, the political wing of the Catholic nationalist Irish Republican Army, ruled out any review of the peace process until Britain reestablished the Power-Sharing Executive in Belfast it suspended last Friday. But Britain has made clear that the executive will remain suspended until the IRA starts handing over some of its weapons to an independent disarming commission. "There is no question of there being a review," Adams said. "There cannot be a review on the basis of a unilateral suspension." The British and Irish governments held crisis talks Wednesday with Northern Ireland's key players, scrambling to salvage the peace process after the IRA pulled out of the disarmament talks Tuesday. At a news conference Wednesday, Adams warned that some paramilitary "micro-groups" opposed to the 1998 Good Friday Agreement might take advantage of the crisis to return to violence. Former Irish Prime Minister John Bruton accused the IRA of deliberately sabotaging the peace process. "I was told by the Irish government that they were working on the basis that (the British government) would restore the (power-sharing) institutions by Friday," Bruton told British Broadcasting Corp. "And now they have been deliberately sabotaged by the IRA." 0- REST OF THE NEWS 0-

GERMANY -- Wolfgang Schaeuble, head of Germany's opposition Christian Democratic Party resigned Wednesday over his handling of the party's illegal funding scandal. Schaeuble, 57, the long-time right-hand man of former Chancellor Helmut Kohl, the architect of German reunification, said he would not stand for reelection to the posts of leader and chairman. He said he was resigning the posts to allow the party to have a "new start" and restore the Christian Democrats' credibility with voters. "There must be a return to a state of affairs that will enable the union to be perceived as a strong opposition to the (ruling) red-green coalition," he said. The parliamentary faction of the CDU will elect a new leader next Tuesday. Finance spokesman Friedrich Merz, 44, is front-runner for the job. CDU

HIJACK -- Pakistan has said it will not take any of the Afghan passengers who are seeking asylum in Britain after their plane was hijacked to London. A spokesman for the Pakistani foreign ministry confirmed that British authorities had approached Pakistan on the matter several days ago. Seventy-four former hostages remain in the United Kingdom, where they are being questioned by immigration officials. Freed hostages in Kabul, Afghanistan, said the hijackers and some passengers belonged to one large family. CNN reported that while most passengers cowered in fear, dozens of others, including many women and children, laughed, tossed aside their veils and received the choicest food and drink from their nominal captors. 0-

PINOCHET -- Former Chilean dictator Augusto Pinochet has suffered brain damage and is mentally unfit to stand trial, Spanish newspapers said Wednesday. The papers cited a confidential report by an independent team of British doctors as saying that the 84-year-old general would have difficulty understanding and answering questions at a trial. The report said that Pinochet had suffered deterioration in the frontal and temporal lobes of his brain, with resulting loss of memory, and that he is unlikely to recover. Most of the damage occurred between September and October 1999, a year after his arrest in London at the request of a Spanish judge. Pinochet faces prosecution in Spain on human-rights charges stemming from his 17-year, iron-fisted rule in Chile. "Pinochet's main medical problems...are a peripheral diabetic neuropathology and a recent cerebral-vascular injury (stroke)," the report said. British Home Secretary Jack Straw reviewed the report before announcing last month that he was "minded" to release Pinochet on humanitarian grounds. 0-

EAST TIMOR -- The United States has offered to maintain a small troop presence in East Timor after the United Nations assumes command of the intervention force next month. But the offer is for an operation outside U.N. command and control, U.S. diplomats told NBC. An international intervention force, known as INTERFET, was organized last summer after a pro-Indonesian militia went on a rampage, killing and pillaging after the island voted for independence from Indonesia. Australia's military led the intervention, and Australia has made it clear that it would have preferred a significant U.S. involvement. 0-

MALAYSIA -- Prosecutors in the trial of former Deputy Prime Minister Anwar Ibrahim are attempting to block a request by his defense team to call Prime Minister Mahathir Mohammed to the stand. They say any evidence the prime minister might give is irrelevant to the sex charges against Ibrahim, whom Mahathir sacked in September 1998. Judge Arifin Jaka said he would rule on the issue on Thursday. Ibrahim is serving a six-year sentence after having been convicted of corruption, but faces another 20 years in prison if convicted on the sex charges. 0-

INDIA -- Four Indian soldiers were killed by gunfire on the Line of Control border with Pakistan-controlled Kashmir Tuesday night. India and Pakistan blamed each other for the incident. The clash took place 117 miles north of the state capital, Jammu. Some 25,000 people have been killed in Muslim-majority Jammu and Kashmir, where Muslim guerrilla groups are seeking to oust India. Tensions between the two giant nuclear-armed nations of South Asia have risen since both of them successfully tested nuclear bombs in 1998. 0-

CHECHNYA -- Russian aircraft and artillery bombarded Chechen guerrilla strongholds in the Argun Gorge in the Caucasus Mountains Wednesday in what was seen as a preparation for a full-scale attack to wipe out the remaining secessionist rebel positions, the Itar-Tass news agency reported. Some 8,000 Chechen guerrillas, including hundreds who escaped from the capital, Grozny, earlier this month, are believed to be holding up in mountain strongholds there. The Chechen kavkaz.org Internet Web site claimed that the Chechens had already repelled a Russian frontal assault on the mouth of the Argun Gorge, but said the Russians had regrouped and were now trying to outflank the Chechen positions. The Web site confirmed the Russian reports of heavy artillery bombardments. Meanwhile, Russian Interior Ministry OMON troops in Grozny carried out a massive security check of 12,000 Chechens there to prevent guerrillas from infiltrating the city again. 0-

Robed in surgical gowns, hoods and protective eyewear, four women hovered over their "patient" like doctors on a mission to save a life.

In a sense, these workers in the "clean room" at Viracon's window factory in Owatonna were trying to do just that _ save lives by fabricating blast and bullet-resistant windows strong enough to help protect federal workers from terrorist attacks.

Working as a team, Sandy Stark, Jennifer Sackett, Sue Harris and Mary Ann Yocum swiftly peeled and layered five-foot sheets of glass, polyurethane, polycarbonate and glass until a 2.1-inch-thick window emerged ready to be vacuum-sealed, pressure cooked and fused into a $2,000 window.

At the other end of the plant, the command "one, two, three, fire!" sounded as researchers Dwight Roos and Brad Erickson cannon-shot a four-foot beam at 34 miles per hour into a test window. The beam bounced off, leaving only circular cracks in the intact glass. Erickson then whaled an ax into another window, producing loud thuds but no flying shards of glass.

Similar production and testing have been nonstop at Viracon and other factories across the nation since demand for blast-mitigating glass first climbed after the Oklahoma City and the U.S. Embassy attacks in Kenya and Tanzania, then skyrocketed after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks.

For decades, protective glass and window films were used by U.S. building owners for protection from hurricanes, sunlight, car accidents or gunshots. Now, these products are finding new life as key tools in mitigating the threat of terrorism to government and commercial buildings.

Total demand for installed laminated windows on new buildings has risen about 33 percent to $4 billion since the 2001 attacks. Film adhesives, which are applied to existing windows and made by 3M Co., CP Films, Bekaert Specialty Films and others, have seen sales leap 40 percent to about $1.4 billion in just 22 months.

A clear need; Starting with the Oklahoma City bombing, makers of protective glass and windows films have seen demand for their products jump. They expect even more....

"This is just the tip of the iceberg," said Virginia Kubler, business director for CP Films, a division of Solutia and one of the largest U.S. window filmmakers. The industry "will grow much more because the government has not completed its risk assessment of federal buildings and . . . it's not more than a third of the way through."

Maplewood-based 3M is watching its film sales sprout 30 percent a year. Windowmakers Apogee Enterprises (Viracon's parent) in Bloomington and Cardinal Glass in Eden Prairie also are benefiting.

Apogee's entire line of blast-resistant laminated glass jumped from $10 million in annual sales five years ago to $80 million now. Apogee's security windows now make up 10 percent of total sales, CEO Russell Huffer said.

At 3M, commercial interest in window film adhesives "has really picked up over 2002 and this year," said Jeff Bradley, business manager for 3M's Consumer Safety and Light Management unit. "Government is just starting to increase [its use] significantly in 2003 because the funding is now available. There was a delay in fiscal funding" for the Defense and Homeland Security departments and the Transportation Security Administration..

"Before 9/11, the U.S. thought terrorism was not going to happen here. After 9/11, there was a heightened awareness that we may need to protect our windows and that this type of product can give you that protection. We had been selling it for years for hurricane protection in the Gulf Coast area . . . I don't think they realized the benefit it had in the event of a bomb blast."

Apogee, whose Harmon Glass division specializes in car windshields, previously marketed its shatter-resistant building windows in the United States as a safeguard against hurricanes, earthquakes and theft.

"Oklahoma City was really the key turning point for us," Huffer said. "The government changed its specifications, because in Oklahoma, it was the flying glass that accounted for an awful lot of injuries. Remember the picture of the fireman carrying the child away from the building? That baby died of flying glass."

The 1995 terrorist bombing at the Alfred P. Murrah Federal Building shattered windows 19 blocks away. In addition to the 168 deaths, thousands were injured and area businesses were shut down for weeks.

Survivors lobbied hard for blast-resistant windows on federal buildings, including Aren Almond-Kok, the mother of the child whose lifeless body was captured in the widely seen photograph.

The glass is installed now in "Federal Reserve buildings, the Pentagon, embassies and National Security buildings. Any building the government felt could be a target for blasts, bombs and flying shard," Huffer said. "And we are a leading supplier of it in the marketplace today."

Apogee's stock reflects the change _ it's jumped from $8 a share to $11.09 since January.

Clients used to be a mix of prisons, banks, pharmacies and stores. Apogee's laminated glass still hangs in the Mall of America's sun roof and covers the Xcel Energy Center in St. Paul, but most of its safety windows are now destined for government projects.

A 528-pound piece of glass manufactured last week will end up at the Lake Street Light Rail Station in Minneapolis, while other pieces were destined for a Texas court house, an airport in Bangkok, Thailand, embassies and other government sites.

Just weeks before the Sept. 11 attacks, Apogee installed its safety glass in the Pentagon. The glass is credited with saving lives because it didn't explode on the jet's impact. Apogee was rewarded with a contract to help rebuild the Pentagon.

Apogee spokeswoman Christine Schaffer said some commercial building owners are moving in the same direction as the government. Last year, a New York City client decided midway through construction to install blast-resistant glass.

A clear need; Starting with the Oklahoma City bombing, makers of protective glass and windows films have seen demand for their products jump. They expect even more....

"They said, 'We want to be able to protect ourselves so we can function should something happen,' " Schaffer said.

The cost of replacing old windows with laminated glass can be steep.

"It might cost $100 a square foot to take out the old and put in the new window that was bomb-blast resistant," Huffer said. "You can buy window film and put it on [an existing window] for maybe $12 a square foot."

Many building owners have instead turned to the window films made by CP Films and 3M.

3M, which began making its window films 30 years ago as a sunscreen for offices, didn't see a spike in sales of its Scotchshield Safety and Security window films until after the two U.S. embassy bombings in Africa. Sales initially surged 20 to 30 percent, but only overseas, Bradley said.

"When the U.S. embassies started to install it, then the other governments said, 'Hey, maybe we ought to do the same thing.' So there was a lot of interest from the NATO partners _ the British, the Germans, the French, the Australians," he said.

3M's U.S. safety film sales didn't jump sharply until after Sept. 11, making the product a multimillion-dollar business. The rise came some 30 years after English officials were beset by Irish Republican Army attacks and asked 3M to strengthen its window sun films to make them blast-resistant.

MAKING WINDOWS STRONGER

Regular window glass

Thickness: Single-strength is 3/32nds of an inch thick, double-strength about 1/8-inch

Cost: Single-strength is about $1.75 a square foot, double-strength about $2.50

Window films

How applied: Special sheets of plastic film, manufactured in accordance with Safety Glazing Standards, are adhered to the interior of an existing office window to give it added strength.

Purpose: Holds glass together if broken so shards don't go airborne. Some window films can withstand an impact of 400 pounds per square foot without piercing. Generally is considered a viable but less-expensive option than laminated windows that are bolted to a building.

Thickness: Typically ranges from 4 to 14 millimeters

Cost: Typically less than $12 a square foot

Laminated windows

How manufactured: Layers of plastic are laminated between sheets of glass to create a window that can withstand various blast loads.

Purpose: Different types of plastics and multiple fused layers create a thicker and stronger window that can resist intense explosions and bullets. Final framing and bolting installation also strengthens the window. Windows typically are made for newly constructed buildings or for costly replacement jobs.

Thickness: Often ranges from 1/4-inch to more than 2 inches.

Cost: Bullet-proof glass can run up to $100 a square foot.

A clear need; Starting with the Oklahoma City bombing, makers of protective glass and windows films have seen demand for their products jump. They expect even m....

Damage-resistant glass

Glass and bullet-resistant polycarbonate are pressure-heated to create a window that can withstand explosions and bullets. Here's an example of how some high-end windows are constructed. Polyurethane, which acts as a bonding agent, is placed between the layers of glass and polycarbonate. Seven hours of heating fuses the layers into the hardened window. The window is more than 2 inches thick.

Layers: Glass, Polycarbonate, Polycarbonate, Glass, Polycarbonate, Glass, Polyurethane between layers.

CHARLOTTE -- Mohamad Hammoud, his brothers and friends blended into America quickly after arriving here in the early 1990s. They landed jobs delivering pizzas, got married and bought homes in modest neighborhoods.

A federal jury decided last year that they also secretly established one of the most sophisticated terrorism fundraising cells detected in recent years in the USA -- for Hezbollah, an organization that before al-Qaeda's Sept. 11 attacks had killed more Americans than any terrorist group.

The cell led by Hammoud, 30, a native of Lebanon, generated up to $ 2 million in profits from smuggling cigarettes purchased in North Carolina and sold in Detroit to elude Michigan's taxes. Part of the proceeds were used to buy high-tech military equipment that was smuggled into Lebanon for use against Israelis.

A U.S. official says there are "hundreds" of Hezbollah members in the USA. Not all are potential terrorists; many support Hezbollah's desire to form an Iranian-style government in Lebanon.

U.S. officials say the Charlotte group's deftness at infiltrating this community illustrates Hezbollah's potential to unleash coordinated attacks in the USA -- if it ever chose to do so.

The case also has added urgency to FBI efforts to identify Hezbollah members here and determine their plans. A senior FBI official says fewer than 20 potential Hezbollah cells are being investigated.

"I believe that if there is a Hezbollah terrorist cell in Charlotte," U.S. Attorney Robert Conrad told Congress in November, "then there are similar cells elsewhere."

'The A-Team' of terrorists

Terrorism investigators and analysts say Hezbollah could attack U.S. interests at home and abroad if the Bush administration were to take on Iran, the group's chief benefactor, or Syria, its supply pipeline between Lebanon and Tehran.

U.S.-Syrian relations have been strained by accusations that Syria helped top Iraqi officials flee coalition forces. Secretary of State Colin Powell recently warned Syrian President Bashar Assad against aiding Palestinian terrorist groups.

U.S. looks at potential danger from Hezbollah

But when it comes to Hezbollah's potential threat on U.S. soil, the bigger worry is Iran and its reaction to U.S. efforts to rebuild Iraq, says Magnus Ranstorp, director of the Center for the Study of Terrorism and Political Violence at St. Andrew's University in Scotland.

"If Iran's agenda isn't satisfied," he says, "the threat from Hezbollah to the U.S. rises exponentially."

U.S. officials have called Hezbollah (which means "party of God" in Arabic) "the A-Team" of terrorist organizations. A radical Shiite group, its leaders are known for carrying out synchronized attacks -- a technique al-Qaeda has copied.

Within a year of its creation in 1982, Hezbollah carried out a suicide bombing that killed 241 people at the U.S. Marine Corps headquarters in Beirut. In 1985, Hezbollah members killed a U.S. Navy diver during the hijacking of TWA Flight 847 in Lebanon. And in the 1990s, the group kidnapped several Americans and Westerners.

Terrorism analysts say Hezbollah attacks on Americans declined as its leaders focused on making the transition from terrorists to political players in Lebanon. Equally significant, analysts say, Hezbollah and other radical Muslim groups realized that they could raise millions of dollars in the USA -- legally and illegally -- as long as they didn't draw attention by killing Americans.

So far, Hezbollah has no reason to jeopardize its money train, Ranstorp says. But if Hezbollah decides to target Americans, he says, "the cost-benefit calculation will be very rational."

The smuggling begins

When Hammoud and his friends arrived here in 1992, they appeared to be law-abiding visitors, says Kenneth Bell, who prosecuted the case.

But in 1996, an off-duty sheriff's deputy near Charlotte alerted authorities after he saw young, Middle Eastern men buying cigarettes in bulk with bags of cash at a wholesaler.

Over the next four years, investigators gathered evidence as the men bought about $ 8 million worth of cigarettes in North Carolina, where the tax was 50 cents a carton, and sold them in Detroit, where the tax was $ 7.50 a carton.

To hide and move their profits, the men used false names, difficult-to-trace cashier's checks and more than 500 accounts at local banks.

Said Mohamad Harb, who lived in Charlotte, provided the link between the cigarette-smuggling operation and a Hezbollah equipment procurement cell in Canada.

Harb was a longtime friend of Mohamad Hassan Dbouk, a high-ranking Hezbollah member who oversaw purchases of military-type equipment, such as night-vision goggles and map copiers, designed to help soldiers improve their ability to attack.

Bell says agents could not track the equipment after it was smuggled into Lebanon. However, a former U.S. intelligence expert testified that during the smuggling operation, Hezbollah fighters became more accurate in shooting Israeli soldiers.

To stay in this country, Hammoud and other defendants engaged in sham marriages to American women out of friendship or in exchange for minor payments.

In all, 19 people were convicted, including Angela Tsioumas, who married Hammoud. She ran a pizza shop where the men worked and became a key player in the cigarette-smuggling scheme.

Five others are fugitives, including Dbouk; Sheik Abbas Harake, Hezbollah's military commander near Beirut; and Hassan Hilu Laqis, its operative in charge of getting equipment from North America.

U.S. looks at potential danger from Hezbollah

Hammoud, who is serving a 155-year sentence, had ties to top Hezbollah leaders in Lebanon. In a letter seized by the FBI, Harake called Hammoud "a dear brother who is hopefully not forgotten his field of work," which Bell says he believes is a reference to terrorism.

In the defendants' homes, investigators also found videotapes of a "martyr squad," strapped with explosives, vowing to "continue to detonate ourselves to cause the earth to shake under the feet of our enemy, America and Israel."

In another video, Hammoud's toddler nephews are urged by adults to "tell them who you are." After being poked in the chest several times, one boy raises his fist and yells, "Hezbollah!"

"All we ever proved was fundraising," Bell says. "There was nothing found of planned violence or that they had ever carried out" any attacks. "But they were in a position to do whatever was asked."

More capable than al-Qaeda

U.S. officials say Hezbollah has more operatives in the USA than al-Qaeda, access to chemical and biological agents through Iran and active training camps in Lebanon.

"Hezbollah has a significant presence in the United States waiting for a call to action," says Sen. Bob Graham, D-Fla., former chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee. He says he is worried about law enforcement's ability to confront the threat.

The task is daunting, Ranstorp says. "Hezbollah is not an organization you just tackle. They are not some small hornets' nest you stick your hand in and get moderately stung. These are super bees who can, because of the Iranian connection, wreak serious havoc to the United States."

Ranstorp says Hezbollah would not launch suicide attacks on U.S. soil unless Iran felt its agenda in neighboring Iraq was threatened. Terrorism analysts say they believe Iran would like to see a clergy-led Islamic government in Iraq.

"Could Iran and Syria bring Hezbollah in? Yes," says Gideon Rose, managing editor of foreign affairs for the non-profit Council on Foreign Relations in Washington. "That would be . . . a scenario that would be bad for us. It would be even worse for Iran and Syria."

Rose says the Iraq war has shown the Middle East that "the last thing you want to do is actually come after the U.S. . . . If you do, we will beat the crap out of you."

FBI officials worry about an alliance between Hezbollah and al-Qaeda.

In his book Inside Al-Qaeda, Rohan Gunaratna wrote that Osama bin Laden put aside religious beliefs years ago and forged ties between the Sunni-dominated al-Qaeda and the Shiite Hezbollah.

With Iran's help, al-Qaeda received training from Hezbollah operatives such as Imad Fayeze Mugniyah, who is credited with perfecting Hezbollah's use of timed, multiple attacks.

But Rose and other analysts say Hezbollah is comparable to the Irish Republican Army in using the United States for fundraising and in its efforts to become a political player.

"The debate is are they going the way of the IRA, toward politics," a senior FBI official says, "or are they just waiting for the opportune moment to strike?"

MIDDLE EAST

JORDAN: HAMAS OFFICES CLOSED -- Security forces closed the Amman offices of the militant Islamic group Hamas, Government officials said, adding that they had not been registered to be used for political activities. Israel has repeatedly asked Jordan to close down the offices of Hamas, which has been held responsible for killing scores of Israelis in suicide bombings. An official said arrest warrants had also been issued but refused to say if Hamas officials were among those being sought. (Reuters)

JORDAN: $50 MILLION FROM U.S. -- The United States agreed to give $50 million to Jordan to help support its balance of payments. A United States Embassy statement said the grant would enable Jordan to reduce its $7 billion in foreign debt and increase its foreign exchange reserves. (AP)

ISRAEL: ARAB GUILTY IN BOMBING -- A military court found a former Palestinian Authority policeman and prison guard guilty of helping to carry out two suicide bombings by the militant Islamic group Hamas that killed 26 people. Ammar al-Zibben, 24, left, said he was proud to have had a hand in the attacks in Jerusalem's main produce market in July and September 1997. The prosecution asked the judges to jail Mr. Zibben for 26 years, one year for each victim. Sentencing was deferred until later this year. (Reuters)

IRAQ: CONGRESSIONAL VISIT -- Aides to five United States members of Congress are in Iraq to try to assess the effect of nine years of international sanctions on civilians. The delegation, drawn from the staffs of four Democrats, Sam Gedge of Connecticut, Cynthia McKinney of Georgia, Earl Hilliard of Alabama and Danny K. Davis of Illinois, and one independent, Bernard Sanders of Vermont, were taken on a tour of Baghdad hospitals and a bomb shelter in which Iraq says 403 people died in allied bombing during the Persian Gulf war. ## World Briefing

NORTHERN IRELAND: 2 MORE EXPULSIONS -- Two more Catholic teen-agers have been ordered to leave Northern Ireland or face death by men who say they represent the Irish Republican Army. One is 15; the other, an unidentified 19-year-old, was beaten before receiving the expulsion order. Four young men left the province over the weekend after receiving similar threats. Protestant politicians contend that the actions undermine claims that the I.R.A.'s two-year-old cease-fire is holding and make Sinn Fein, the group's political ally, unfit to take part in peace talks that are set to resume next week. Warren Hoge (NYT)

CZECH REPUBLIC: GYPSY WALL HALTED -- Authorities have halted the construction of a six-foot wall that would have separated Gypsy families from other residents in the northern town of Usti nad Labem, Czech Television reported. A local council approved the wall last year after residents complained of noise and the unsightly state of apartment blocks inhabited by Gypsy families. Construction was to begin this week, but the plan drew protests from President Vaclav Havel, human rights campaigners and Western governments. (Reuters)

EUROPEAN UNION: COMMISSION HEARINGS -- Legislators of the European Parliament began seven days of grueling questioning of 19 nominees to Romano Prodi's new European Commission, seeking guarantees that the new executive will respect high ethical standards after the fraud scandal that brought down the previous team in March. The first member on the stand, Loyola de Palacio, was quizzed repeatedly in a three-hour hearing about fraud allegations dating back to her days as Spain's farm minister. She pledged to resign if ever implicated in fraud but denied any wrongdoing. (Reuters)

RUSSIA: DAGESTAN FIGHTING GOES ON -- Government troops battled to wipe out a stronghold of Islamic militants in Dagestan, southern Russia, striking with helicopters and artillery. Troops seized four largely deserted villages in the Karamakhi district of Dagestan, a republic between the Caspian Sea and the breakaway republic of Chechnya. Fighting continued as soldiers sought to eliminate any remaining resistance. (AP)

THE AMERICAS

MEXICO: PRI GAINS IN STRENGTH -- President Ernesto Zedillo's Institutional Revolutionary Party, known as the PRI, continues to gain electoral strength across Mexico, according to a nationwide poll by the newspaper Reforma. Francisco Labastida Ochoa, a former Interior Minister, and Roberto Madrazo Pintado, a former Governor of Tabasco, the leading candidates for the PRI's Nov. 7 presidential primary, are virtually tied in voter preferences 10 weeks before the primary vote. Sam Dillon (NYT)

MEXICO: PLEA ON UNIVERSITY STRIKE -- The five living ex-presidents of the National Autonomous University of Mexico appealed for an end to a student strike that has paralyzed Latin America's largest university for four months. Led by Pablo Gonzalez Casanova, who headed the university in the early 70's, the ex-presidents called the strike illegal but insisted that it be settled without violence. Julia Preston (NYT)

PERU: REBEL SENTENCED TO LIFE -- A military tribunal handed a life sentence to the top leader of the Maoist rebel group Shining Path. Oscar Ramirez Durand, 46, was found guilty of treason in a closed military trial, the Supreme Military Justice Council said in a statement. He was considered the last top rebel leader still at large before he was captured on July 14. He will serve a life term without chance of parole in a high-security prison at a naval base in Lima, where the group's founder, Abimael Guzman, is also imprisoned. (AP) and were about to stage another attack. No new attacks were made, and residents began burying the victims, most of them young children. The army said 20 rebels were also killed in the raid on two suburbs. (Reuters)

ASIA

MYANMAR: OPPOSITION LEADER BLASTED -- The military Government issued a stinging personal attack on the opposition leader Daw Aung San Suu Kyi, accusing her of "mental atrophy" and of lending support to dissidents calling for a popular uprising to topple military rule on Sept. 9. The military said the leader of the National League for Democracy was acting "recklessly," and that any attempt at an uprising would fail and be "the swan song of disaffected individuals." (Agence France-Presse)

INDIA: KASHMIR FIGHTING FLARES -- At least 24 people, including 13 Muslim separatists, have been killed in stepped-up violence before elections next month in the disputed Indian state of Kashmir, officials said. The state administration asked New Delhi for more troops in the face of threats from a Pakistan-based guerrilla group that it would renew attacks on Indian forces in the region. India has already sanctioned a 28,000-member paramilitary force to back Kashmir's 70,000 policemen in guarding the region's 6,500 polling stations during voting in Kashmir's six parliamentary districts on Sept. 5, 11 and 18. (Agence France-Presse)

AFGHANISTAN: REBELS CLAIM A VICTORY -- Afghanistan's northern-based opposition alliance said it captured a strategic northern district from the Taliban Islamic militia after heavy fighting. The opposition fighters routed the hard-line Taliban from Sangcharak district in Sar-i-Pul province, according to Hussain Anwari, an opposition spokesman. The area, 180 miles from Kabul, the capital, is at the crossroads of northern Jozjan and Sar-i-Pul provinces. At least 15 Taliban were killed and 65 taken prisoners, Mr. Anwari said, who gave no details about opposition casualties. (AP)

JAPAN: KOREANS' PLEA REJECTED -- The Tokyo High Court rejected a demand from 369 South Koreans for a Government apology and compensation for Japan's colonial rule of the Korean Peninsula, a court official said. The ruling upheld a 1996 lower court ruling, the official said. The Koreans also said Japan's Parliament neglected to make laws to compensate women forced into army brothels in World War II, the Kyodo News Agency said. (AP)

A wall of British army steel prevented a small Orange Order parade from passing a hostile Catholic neighborhood Wednesday as mass demonstrations by Northern Ireland's major Protestant brotherhood began against a backdrop of fear and violence.

As a police spotter plane circled overhead, about 200 Orangemen in suits and orange vestments, accompanied by four bands of accordionists, fifiers and drummers, paraded less than a mile from their Ballynafeigh Orange Hall to a barrier on Ormeau Bridge. Beyond, heavily guarded by police, lay a half-dozen side streets called the Lower Ormeau where hatred of the Orange Order runs high.

The Orangemen, as expected, refused to take a different route downtown where 10,000 members of their fraternal group were gathering for Belfast's mass parade in honor of Protestant King William of Orange, who defeated a Catholic foe at the Battle of the Boyne on July 12, 1690.

Instead they stood their ground and waited beneath banners portraying the victorious William, sword drawn atop a mythic white horse, and the British crown atop an open Bible both favorite Orange symbols.

As happened last year, when authorities prevented the same small parade from reaching the main rallying point, the entire Belfast Orange organization some 250 lodges and 150 bands planned to march to a park directly across the river from the Catholic enclave.

That move was only the latest in 10 days of efforts, mostly illegal and many violent, by Orangemen and anti-Catholic paramilitary groups to pressure British authorities into dropping restrictions on the order's long-held parade routes.

Overnight, violence escalated as thousands of Orangemen drank heavily around traditional bonfires of wood planks, furniture and tires.

In Larne, a mostly Protestant port town north of Belfast, a Protestant man was shot dead in front of one bonfire crowd, who later fought police as they tried gain access to the body.

The victim wasn't immediately identified. Police said they believed he was targeted as part of an ongoing bloody feud between members of two outlawed anti-Catholic groups, both of which are supposed to be observing cease-fires in support of Northern Ireland's 1998 peace accord.

Orange Order Parade Sparks Violence

The biggest outlawed gang, the Ulster Defense Association, staged so-called "shows of strength" appearances of gun-toting masked members at several bonfires. The most dramatic was on Belfast's Shankill Road, where four men and a woman fired automatic assault rifles and pistols into the night sky.

And in Portadown, a Protestant stronghold southwest of Belfast and epicenter of this month's turmoil, a mob of masked youths went straight from one midnight bonfire where they had burned an effigy of a member of the province's mostly Protestant police force to do battle with rows of heavily girded officers and soldiers.

In intense exchanges that followed for three hours, the security forces fired water cannons and volleys of plastic bullets at rioters. Police said 21 officers were wounded, including a policewoman struck in the face with a firecracker, as were five soldiers, one of them set alight by a gasoline bomb.

In hard-line Protestant parts of north Belfast, a crowd attacked paramedics trying to get to one emergency location and a crossbow bolt shattered the window of a passing car, cutting the female driver in the hand.

Orange leaders have insisted all week they didn't want any violence, but some moderate critics within the organization complained their confrontational street protests made this inevitable.

"I don't wear my (Orange) collarette with the pride I used to, not when I see people blocking roads with pipes in their hands," said William Brown, a one-time senior Belfast Orangeman who noted the organization's membership was growing increasingly unsavory.

As a police spotter plane circled overhead, about 200 members of the Protestant brotherhood, called the Orange Order, paraded from their Ballynafeigh Orange Hall. Dressed in suits and orange vestments, the Orangemen were accompanied by four bands of accordion, fife and drum.

After less than a mile, they reached an impenetrable barrier on Ormeau Bridge. Beyond the bridge, guarded by police and soldiers, lay a half-dozen side streets called the Lower Ormeau, where hatred of the Orange Order runs high.

The Orangemen, as expected, refused to take a different route to downtown, where 10,000 members of their fraternal group were gathering for Belfast's mass parade in honor of Protestant King William of Orange, who defeated a Catholic foe at the Battle of the Boyne on July 12, 1690.

Instead they stood their ground and waited beneath banners portraying the victorious William, sword drawn atop a mythic white horse, and the British crown atop an open Bible both favorite Orange symbols. "If God Be For Us, Who Can Be Against Us?" proclaimed one standard.

An Anglican minister, the Rev. William Hoey, stood in front of the wall to lead the crowd in the Lord's Prayer and an attack on Catholic politicians who seek closer ties with the Republic of Ireland.

"There is no peace in this land so long as republicanism calls the shots," he said in reference to the most militant section of Catholic opinion. "We say to the government, take them on and put them down once and for all."

As happened last year, when authorities prevented the same small parade from reaching the main rallying point, the entire Belfast Orange organization some 250 lodges and 150 bands marched to a park directly across the river from the Catholic enclave to have lunch and hear speeches.

That move was only the latest in 10 days of efforts, mostly illegal and many violent, by Orangemen and anti-Catholic paramilitary groups to pressure British authorities into dropping restrictions on the order's long-held parade routes.

Orange Order Parade Sparks Violence

Overnight, violence escalated as thousands of Orangemen drank heavily around traditional bonfires of wood planks, furniture and tires.

In Larne, a mostly Protestant port town north of Belfast, a Protestant man was beaten up and shot through the back of the head in front of one bonfire crowd, who later fought police as they tried gain access to the body. Police said the victim was targeted as part of an ongoing bloody feud between members of two outlawed anti-Catholic groups, both of which are supposed to be observing cease-fires in support of Northern Ireland's 1998 peace accord.

The biggest outlawed gang, the Ulster Defense Association, staged so-called "shows of strength" appearances of gun-toting masked members at several bonfires. The most dramatic was on Belfast's Shankill Road, where four men and a woman fired automatic assault rifles and pistols into the night sky.

And in Portadown, a Protestant stronghold southwest of Belfast and epicenter of this month's turmoil, a mob of masked youths went straight from one midnight bonfire where they had burned an effigy of a member of the province's mostly Protestant police force to do battle with rows of heavily girded officers and soldiers.

In intense exchanges that followed for three hours, the security forces fired water cannons and volleys of plastic bullets at rioters. Police said 21 officers were wounded, including a policewoman struck in the face with a firecracker, as were five soldiers, one of them set alight by a gasoline bomb.

In hard-line Protestant parts of north Belfast, a crowd attacked paramedics trying to get to one emergency location and a crossbow bolt shattered the window of a passing car, cutting the female driver in the hand.

Orange leaders have insisted all week they didn't want any violence, but some moderate critics within the organization complained their confrontational street protests made this inevitable.

"I don't wear my (Orange) collarette with the pride I used to, not when I see people blocking roads with pipes in their hands," said William Brown, a one-time senior Belfast Orangeman who noted the organization's membership was growing increasingly unsavory.

To the beat of pounding drums, Protestant hard-liners marched in their tens of thousands Wednesday and vowed to protest until they regain the right to parade past hostile Catholic areas.

More than 80,000 members of the Orange Order, Northern Ireland's once-dominant Protestant fraternal group, paraded through Belfast and 17 other towns to commemorate the triumph of the Protestant King William of Orange versus a Catholic foe on July 12, 1690.

The annual Twelfth demonstrations always bring rivalries between British Protestants and Irish Catholics to the boil. But with several parades blocked this year from going through or near Catholic areas by British security forces, Protestant anger turned against fellow Protestants over who to blame for the past 10 days of widespread rioting.

"We meet here today under extremely difficult circumstances. Our city and our country are being ravaged by terrorism and lawlessness," Jim Rodgers, a Belfast councilman, told fellow Orangemen in a city park.

Several militants in the audience heckled Rodgers as soon as he appealed for the riots to end immediately because they were self-destructive.

"Those that are suffering are people in our own areas. We are destroying our properties, we are hitting our churches, we're taking people's cars and burning them," Rodgers said.

He had to shout above the insults flying from a few who accused his Ulster Unionist Party of caving in to Irish Republican Army supporters to make peace.

IRA supporters are prominent in all the anti-Orange protest groups, and the Ulster Unionists and IRA-linked Sinn Fein party are uncomfortable partners in Northern Ireland's power-sharing government.

Orange Order Parade Sparks Violence

Many Orangemen oppose negotiations with the protesters on the same grounds that they reject sharing power with Sinn Fein: The belief that their enemy will never be satisfied no matter how many compromises are made, so no compromises should be made.

Orangemen insisted their demonstrations should be treated as inoffensive, colorful pageants. The lodges march with hand-painted banners portraying important events in Protestant history and mythology: King William on his white horse; the Harland and Wolff shipyard and its most famous product, the Titanic; Protestants dying on World War I battlefields.

But across the Lagan River from the Orange demonstration, the Catholics of the Lower Ormeau neighborhood were savoring a respite from this pageantry, thanks to a British army blockade that prevented a small Orange parade from passing their area that morning.

They said the sound of the Orangemen's rowdy bands of fife and drum sent shivers down their spine.

"Thankfully we can't see them. But just listening to these god-awful bands in the distance reminds people here of the pure hate involved. We just don't want any part of it," said John Gormley, who has helped organize anti-parade protests since 1995.

Several Orange speakers noted bitterly Wednesday that the British government and Royal Ulster Constabulary the province's predominantly Protestant police had decided this year to confront Orangemen rather than Catholic protesters. In 1996 and 1997, the protesters were violently forced off disputed streets to make way for Orangemen. Intense Catholic riots followed.

"The Orange Order will not be surrendering its culture, its history and its tradition to the demands of Sinn Fein-IRA or any of its residents groups," said Denis Watson, the senior Orangeman in County Armagh, where the order was born in 1795 following a sectarian gun battle.

The order's anti-Catholicism was underscored at several rallies, which adopted motions calling for Anglican, Methodist and Presbyterian churches to end all ecumenical cooperation with Catholics.

The Rev. William Hoey, an Anglican minister, claimed that all Catholic politicians supported the republican movement of the IRA and Sinn Fein, and so Protestants should defeat them, not compromise.

"There will be no peace in this land as long as republicanism calls the shots and gets away with what they want to do," he told the 200 Orangemen blocked from marching past the half-dozen side streets constituting the Lower Ormeau.

"They accept nothing unless it is done to their agenda," he said through a bullhorn in front of a 20-foot-high steel wall erected across a bridge. "So we say to the government: Take them on and put them down once and for all."

But in a sign that the turmoil might finally be subsiding, police reported all of the most volatile Protestant areas quiet as the Orangemen's marches ceased and darkness approached.

More than 80 police and soldiers have been wounded during the rioting. The worst clash came overnight Tuesday in Portadown, where a mob burned an effigy of a policeman on a bonfire then threw gasoline bombs, firecrackers and at least one homemade grenade at joint police-army forces protecting the town's surrounded Catholic district.

Orangemen insisted their demonstrations should be treated as inoffensive, colorful pageants. Jas Mooney is the son of a Belfast man whose pub was bombed repeatedly in the 30 years before the 1998 Northern Ireland peace agreement, when sectarian violence took on such a sense of permanence in this society that it was referred to simply as The Troubles.

Today, Mr. Mooney, 38, is the director of a chain of sleek downtown bars staffed by young Roman Catholics and Protestants working side by side, and bearing an architectural feature unthinkable during that violence-prone time. The bars all have long street fronts made of glass.

As open, confident and quietly defiant as his businesses' facades, Mr. Mooney's attitude is a reflection of what this capital city has started to become since the Irish Republican Army and its counterpart Protestant paramilitary groups declared cease-fires in 1997 and the peace agreement was signed a year later.

Notably, it is the same face that many of Belfast's residents are turning toward the latest setback in that peace process -- the expected shutdown on Monday of the Northern Ireland Assembly, the centerpiece of the accord intended to parcel power equally between the province's Protestant majority and its Roman Catholic minority.

The impasse is the worst in the four-year history of the crisis-ridden agreement, and it has prompted expressions of concern from politicians and other opinion makers about an end to the path toward a permanent peace, and a return to the violence of the past.

But Belfast is having none of it.

"The overall feeling is not one of fear, it's one of frustration," said Petra Devitt, 27, a marketing manager for a bar, bistro and nightclub complex in part of an old paint factory that draws nightly blocklong lines to a onetime no-go area in downtown Belfast. "Most of the people I know will be saying, 'Let's just get on with it, and don't pay attention to those political eejits,' " Ms. Devitt said. The Irish slang version of "idiot," more affectionate than accusatory, suggests someone distracted and ultimately harmless.

On Monday, Britain will declare the Northern Ireland Assembly suspended, a step it is taking after the legislature's Protestant members said they would resign their posts on Tuesday to protest continuing I.R.A. activities while the clandestine guerrilla group's political wing, Sinn Fein, remains a participant in government. A walkout by the

The Troubles in Ulster Shift From Street to the Assembly

Protestants would have ended the power-sharing project; a suspension of the assembly, something that Britain is resorting to for the fourth time, puts it on hold and carries the promise of future revival.

People in the streets, shopping malls and cafes around Belfast voice real regret that the experiment in local government is coming to a halt, but few argue that the progress made up to now will be reversed or that the organized violence of the three decades leading up to the peace agreement will return.

"There's no panic reaction this time," said David Dunseith, 56, the host of Northern Ireland's leading radio talk show, in an interview on Saturday. "The evidence for that doesn't come just from the calls, but I saw people on the way home tonight in my supermarket and all they're saying is 'C'mon, we've got to pay for our groceries and get on with it. We're not afraid.' That's what's on their minds."

Mr. Dunseith, whose daily program "Talk Back," on BBC Northern Ireland, gives vent to the polar opinions of his Ulster listeners, said he had not had a single caller as the crisis unfolded in recent weeks who thought the I.R.A. would use the current shutdown as cause for returning to violence.

"I go back to the dark days in Belfast when there was anarchy on the street, clattering armored cars all around the place and nobody went out," he said.

"I guarantee you that there will be thousands of people out in downtown Belfast tonight, and they won't be discussing the peace process, how long the suspension will last or when we get new assembly elections."

A decade ago, downtown Belfast was a place people avoided because of assassinations, abductions and bombings. Today, it is an urban showcase of newly sand-blasted monuments and clock towers; once-derelict warehouses and factories converted into high-tech office buildings and luxury apartments; and restored courthouses, banks and indoor markets from the Victorian period, when Belfast was called the second city of the Empire, and looked like it.

As the population gets younger, the old prejudices are becoming dated. Manus McConn, 40, owns two restaurants in Belfast's university district that employ students, and he said, "I've watched the generations come through here, and with each one there is a noticeable thinning of bigotry."

Belfast remains a city with Catholic and Protestant working-class communities demarcated by painted curbs, Irish or British flags and walls covered with menacing twists of concertina wire and murals portraying masked gunmen and militant slogans. Paramilitary gangs enforce street discipline among their own by vigilante attacks and punishment beatings that can leave victims permanently maimed. Some Protestant housing projects have become the scenes of violent turf wars and drug disputes.

But these areas are increasingly insulated from the rest of the city. "The only time I ever go to those places is when I have visitors from out of town who want to see them," said John Morison, 44, professor of jurisprudence at Queen's University. He remembered staying away from downtown and observing a family curfew as a youth for fear of getting caught up in random violence.

In an image of the kind of cohabitation that has taken hold here, a crew club on this Sunday morning glided its sculls in practice runs along the Lagan River and families strolled the Donegall Quay promenade, while just blocks away in one of Belfast's most conflict-ridden areas, residents of the Catholic Short Strand and Protestant Cluan Place shot harassing fireworks over the wall dividing their two communities. Many people who fled Belfast in the bad years have returned now that the violence has ebbed.

One of them in the crowds of shoppers in the City Hall square on Saturday was Susan Marsh, 43, who came back with her 10-year-old daughter Marissa after 16 years in Germany.

"Right over there used to be a great steel wall," she said, "and to get into the street and then into the shops, you had to be searched right down to your lipstick holders."

The Troubles in Ulster Shift From Street to the Assembly

So what was her attitude about the suspension of government? "Oh, I've given up on Northern Ireland's politicians, but I haven't given up on Northern Ireland," she said. "It's a great place, and I've never looked back."

Richard English, professor of politics at Queen's, said he thought people would be patient because they were now confident that a resolution was in sight.

"Everyone thinks they see the broad shape of the deal," he said. "It's some form of power-sharing, with Dublin and London both involved and the paramilitaries eventually having gray hair, wearing suits and being in government."

Paul Arthur, professor of politics at the University of Ulster, said the public had clearly moved ahead of the politicians.

"The mistake the politicians have made is not to realize how progressive their constituents are," he said. "People are reacting the way they are because this process has given the residents of Northern Ireland the first chance in their lifetimes to get rid of their fatalism," he said. "It also gave them a proprietary sense of pride -- they got the assembly up and running and it worked, even if it is shutting down now."

Although this is the fourth time the government will have been suspended, the expectation is that this shutdown will take longer than the others, which lasted three months the first time and a day the next two times.

Still, Monica McWilliams of the Women's Coalition, one of the 108 legislators who will be losing their jobs tomorrow, was not overly pessimistic.

"The one thing that makes our system work is time," she said. "It is time that has been our healer."

SACRAMENTO, Calif.

Light mountain snow means less electricity

California's hopes of averting blackouts this summer were dimmed Friday by low snowpack measurements in the Sierra Nevada, which means less water to run the region's hydroelectric plants.

California draws about a fourth of its power from state hydroelectric plants, and the state relies heavily on winter rain and snow to fill the reservoirs.

The low Sierra Nevada snowpack means California's hydroelectric production may fall more than a third below normal this summer, said Maury Roos, California's chief hydrologist.

California already expected little hydroelectric power from the Northwest, which has been stricken by drought.
LOS ANGELES

Police officer pleads guilty in corruption case

A former police officer arrested in the biggest corruption scandal to rock the Los Angeles department pleaded guilty Friday to charges stemming from the shooting of a gang member. The former officer, Nino Durden, will get nearly eight years in prison.

Durden admitted to conspiracy to obstruct justice, perjury, filing a false police report and grand theft. Durden also agreed to cooperate with prosecutors.

NATION &amp; WORLD BRIEFS

Durden worked in the department's Rampart division, which is at the center of a scandal in which anti-gang officers are accused of robbing, beating, framing and shooting suspects. More than 100 convictions have been thrown out because of the allegations.

LOS ANGELES

Heidi Fleiss is arrested on parole charges

Heidi Fleiss, the former "Hollywood Madam" who was released from federal prison in 1999, has been arrested for allegedly using methamphetamines, authorities said Friday.

Fleiss, 35, was taken into custody by federal marshals on Thursday afternoon after arriving for her regularly scheduled meeting with a probation officer, the U.S. attorney's office said.

The arrest warrant charged Fleiss with admitting to the use of methamphetamines and failing to report for her mandatory drug testing, both violations of her supervised release from a federal prison.

The woman whose call-girl ring catered to the rich and famous in Los Angeles spent more than three years behind bars for her conviction on federal charges of conspiracy, tax evasion and money-laundering.

AUSTIN, Texas

Suspect in atheist's death gets 20 years

The key suspect in the slaying of atheist leader Madalyn Murray O'Hair and two of her family members was sentenced Friday to 20 years in prison on a federal extortion charge.

David Waters, 54, admitted in January that he did "threaten and commit physical violence" to O'Hair, 76, her son Jon Garth Murray, 40, and granddaughter Robin Murray O'Hair, 30.

Waters led authorities to a mass grave west of San Antonio containing the dismembered and burned remains of the family in January. He agreed to disclose the grave in return for being allowed to plead guilty to a single extortion conspiracy charge.

Waters is already serving 60 years on a state robbery conviction.

WASHINGTON

Bush and president of Brazil discuss trade

President George W. Bush sought Friday to gloss over his differences with Brazil over trade, saying, "Absolutely, we can work together" on establishing a hemispheric free trade zone.

Bush said he and President Fernando Henrique Cardoso decided in their meeting to try "to iron out any differences that may exist" over a 34-nation free trade zone in the Western Hemisphere.

Brazil is Latin America's biggest country. It has warily participated in years of negotiations for the free trade pact. Cardoso's government accuses the United States of unfairly using trade barriers to protect inefficient U.S. industries and keep out Brazilian exports, such as steel and produce.

GERMANY

Parliament moves to ban far-right political party

The German Parliament asked the Supreme Court on Friday to ban a far-right party, saying it encourages hate crimes and has "a clear affinity with Nazism."

Both houses submitted 500 pages of documents in seeking to outlaw the National Democratic Party. The government already applied in January for a ban.

The multiple applications, although not legally required, are meant to show politicians' united front against a resurgence of violent neo-Nazis.

Postwar Germany has only banned two parties: a successor to the Nazis in 1952 and the Communist Party in 1956. Parliament's lower house said that the party, known by its initials NPD, has "a clear affinity with Nazism."

RUSSIA

Final cut is made in huge rail tunnel

Construction workers cut through a Siberian rock face on Friday to open what will be Russia's longest railway tunnel, completing a 24-year-old Soviet-era project.

Construction of the 9 1/2-mile Severomuisk tunnel, in southeastern Siberia east of Lake Baikal, began in 1977. The site is about 2,700 miles southeast of Moscow.

The tunnel is the last and one of the most ambitious in a series of Soviet industrial projects that required huge state funding and masses of cheap labor.

The tunnel will cut 124 miles off the journey to Russia's Pacific ports compared to the route taken by the older, Trans-Siberian Railway.

IRELAND

Dublin authorities seize suspected terrorist chief

The man accused of heading an outlawed group responsible for the deadliest bomb attack in Northern Ireland's history was ordered held without bail in the Republic of Ireland Friday on a terrorism charge.

NATION &amp; WORLD BRIEFS

Detectives escorted Mickey McKevitt, the alleged commander of a group called the Real IRA, to a surprise late-night session of Dublin's Special Criminal Court, which has three judges and no jury. McKevitt, 51, was charged with "directing terrorism," an offense created by Irish lawmakers in response to a car-bomb attack in 1998 in the Northern Ireland town of Omagh that killed 29 people, most of them women or children.

McKevitt was arrested Thursday at his home near Dundalk, 50 miles north of Dublin, on suspicion of involvement in the hard-line faction, which opposes the Irish Republican Army's cease-fire of 1997.

MEXICO

12 officials caught in sting operation are fired

In its first strike against corruption, Mexico's new government has fired 12 officials - three of them in senior positions - after they were allegedly caught taking bribes in an undercover sting operation.

The 12 officials included the transport and communication ministry's internal auditor and its directors of federal transport and preventive medicine. They could all face criminal charges.

In the sting operation, employees of the state auditor's office, posing as civilians, were sent to transport ministry offices in five cities to pay bribes for drivers licenses without taking driving or medical tests.

"We saw in some of these offices that they could be illegally taking in more than 25,000 pesos ($ 2,500) a day and dividing it between the people participating in the scheme," Francisco Barrio, head of the state auditor's office, said at a news conference Friday.

BRITAIN

Second body is found near 2 crashed jets

Searchers recovered a second body Friday near the wreckage of two U.S. Air Force F-15s that crashed on a Scottish mountain peak, police said.

The body, which has yet to be identified, was found close to the summit of Ben Macdhui in the Cairngorm Mountains, where the two jets crashed Monday, Grampian police said.

The body of one pilot of the single-seat jets - Lt. Col. Kenneth John Hyvonen, 40, from Michigan - was found Tuesday. The body found Friday was believed to be the second pilot, Capt. Kirk Jones. A formal identification was to be conducted by medical officers.

The two aircraft vanished 45 minutes after taking off at midday Monday from Lakenheath air base, 75 miles northeast of London.

GEORGE MOORE, 1852-1933.

By Adrian Frazier.

Illustrated. 604 pp. New Haven:

Yale University Press. $35.

In 1935 the poet W. B. Yeats recollected how George Moore, who had died in 1933, had as a young man left his County Mayo home for Paris, where he sat "among art students, young writers about to become famous, in some cafe, a man carved out of a turnip, looking out of astonished eyes." In focusing on Moore's appearance Yeats was of course taking sweet revenge on the man who had once caught him memorably at Lady Gregory's Coole Park "standing lost in meditation before a white congregation of swans assembled on the lake, looking himself in his old cloak like a huge umbrella left behind by some picnic party."

However, Yeats was also responding to something essentially strange and disconcerting in Moore's appearance that friends and enemies noted throughout his life. His own mother had thought him the ugly duckling of her brood and even some of his many lovers found him an odd enough specimen. Adrian Frazier in his revealing biography deploys throughout his text brief verbal snapshots of his subject supplied by Moore's contemporaries, as if to confirm what the novelist himself told his mother in a sadly brave letter: "I was born, I live and I shall die a peculiar man -- I could not be be commonplace were I to try." One former lover in a roman clef had him with "narrow chest and sloping shoulders" and "boneless, fat, soft and white hands." Another woman described him as possessing "a long colorless face that looked like a codfish crossed by a satyr." Oscar Wilde noted his "vague, formless, obscene face," while the Irish poetaster James Cousins saw a "pasty face and vague eyes . . . straw-colored hair that looked as if it had been pitchforked on."

Portrait of a Turnip

Given such unprepossessing physical attributes (and portraits or caricatures by, among others, Manet, Sickert and Beerbohm, as well as the photographic record, confirm that Moore was a ready target for the verbal lampoon), it is initially surprising that Moore enjoyed so many amorous conquests. In his lifetime many assumed that most of these were of the literary variety -- all talk and little action. The Irish painter Sarah Purser's quip that "some men kiss and tell; Moore tells but doesn't kiss" (recycled by Susan Mitchell, author of the first book on Moore) was in fact, as Frazier suggests, doubly wrong. For Moore was by no means sexually inactive, and in his many liaisons he was an advocate of the joys of oral sex when pregnancy was an inhibition. Frazier puts definitively to rest any suspicion that Moore merely posed as a roue for scandalous effect. For upon discovering that he could be attractive to women he made the most of the opportunities bohemian and literary fame afforded until in a goatish, impotent old age, he became, as Frazier euphemistically has it, a "tactilist," with a notable penchant for bottom-pinching.

Frazier, who teaches English at Union College in Schenectady, N.Y., deals interestingly with the matter of Moore's peculiar sexual nature, which constitutes one of the mysteries of his career. His conclusion that Moore was "a homosexual man who loved to make love to women" rings a little too confidently, however, in view of the story he tells. For at its heart is material Moore's first biographer, Joseph Hone, could not include -- the long, intense, bittersweet affair with Maud Cunard that lasted from before Maud's marriage to the shipping magnate until Maud forsook Moore for the younger Thomas Beecham. And most poignantly, both Moore and Cunard's daughter, Nancy, suspected that they were father and daughter and, although neither was certain, deeply felt this to be the case. Moore's relationship with mother and daughter Cunard, as Frazier recounts it, does much to humanize a figure who might otherwise have become an increasingly tiresome sexual conundrum.

If Frazier finds Moore's sexual nature a constant fascination, he is troubled by another mystery -- the current literary status of his subject. In his final chapter he acknowledges that Moore himself spent his last 15 years fretting that "the canon of English fiction for his era would have room for no more than three novelists, and the three most likely to end up there would be James, Hardy and Conrad. . . . The door would shut on Moore." And one senses that Frazier knows the door has in fact shut pretty firmly on his subject, for all that he admires Moore's work and is interested by the man. His strategy to rescue Moore from the comparative obscurity into which he has sunk is to write a biography that sets him firmly in the three contexts in which he flourished -- the Paris of Manet, Zola, Mallarmé and Degas; the London of the 1880's and 90's; and turn-of-the-century Dublin when the Irish literary revival was at its height, before Moore's protracted decline in London when the literary limelight fell on a new generation. Moore knew everybody worth knowing in these years: his relationships with Zola, Mallarmé and Manet; his defense of progressive literary values against the circulating libraries and Mrs. Grundy in Victorian London, when a publisher went to jail for publishing Zola entire and Wilde was destroyed; his battles with Yeats and Lady Gregory in Dublin on the future of Irish theater -- these make for compelling and often entertaining reading. Frazier writes with a genially mordant, even worldly tone about the many excesses and absurdities of Moore's public and private dealings, with a character list that constitutes a cultural history of the period (Moore emerges as the principal champion of Impressionism in England, when he had graduated from being "Zola's ricochet").

And behind all the journalistic, literary and aesthetic maneuvering, the outrageous and hilarious episodes that made Moore notorious in his time, the history of Ireland rumbles threateningly on, like a bass theme in a symphony -- the estate in County Mayo that he had inherited on his father's death in 1870 became more and more of a burden in an era of land wars and rising republicanism; Moore quarreled irrevocably about religion and family with a brother who resided there by his leave; finally Moore Hall itself was torched by the Irish Republican Army in 1923, during the Civil War, a symbol of the fall of feudalism.

Yet for all its strengths, Frazier's book still leaves one wondering about the reputation. It may be that Moore's fiction (his primary claim on posterity, though he recurrently tried for a dramatic success) is crippled by what Jorge Luis Borges identified as the fault of the imaginary Herbert Quain: "His books are over-anxious to astonish." For the writer who took as his creed Manet's injunction to be ashamed of nothing but shame itself relished shocking his public with a fiction of disturbing realism and candid self-revelation to the point that the reader is no longer surprised and can weary of a species of literary exhibitionism ("astonishment by rote" was Borges's damning phrase for Quain).

Portrait of a Turnip

Or perhaps Moore's reputation in his lifetime was too dependent on what Frazier, in a term derived from the theory seminar, identifies as the "author function." This was a "life-long project of constructing . . . 'George Moore' as his chief creation," which involved studiously elaborating "a complex and developing identity for public consumption" and not only the publication of books but a self-advertising campaign in the newspapers and "public enactment of a studied role." With the actual death of the author the "author function" inevitably lost some of its power and the reputation was a matter of the texts alone and could not, it seems, be sustained.

This indeed may be the metaphorical significance of the announcement of sexual impotence in the three-volume "Hail and Farewell" (the one work by Moore, along with the realist fiction "Esther Waters" and a handful of short stories that will probably resist time's revenges), where "George Moore" in a brilliant semi-fictional autobiography is revealed as treacherous friend, self-mocking comedian of the Irish literary revival, lampoonist of genius. Oddly Frazier, so interested in Moore's strange masculinity, makes little critically of this extraordinary confession, which may, as Moore displays himself at the height of his powers, prefigure a time when he knows he will no longer be in control of the reception of the astonishing works of that irresistible fellow, "George Moore," whom he had sedulously fashioned from unlikely materials.

RUSSIA: Putin inaugurated, names prime minister

MOSCOW - President Vladimir Putin pledges to finish building democracy in Russia and restore it as a world power after taking the oath of office in the first democratic transfer of power in the vast nation's history. Putin names economist Mikhail Kasyanov as prime minister, with the task of turning general promises of reform into a long-awaited program to repair Russia's economy.

SIERRA LEONE: U.N. and rebel officials plan bid for hostages' release

FREETOWN, Sierra Leone - U.N. peacekeepers and officials from the rebel Revolutionary United Front plan to fly into the country's interior Sunday to try to arrange the freedom of hundreds of captive peacekeepers. The trip would come just one day after the RUF and U.N. peacekeepers battled one another outside the capital, Freetown. The United States, meanwhile, warns Americans against traveling to Sierra Leone, orders nonessential personnel out of the embassy in Freetown.

PHILIPPINES: Hostages beg government to pull back troops

JOLO, Philippines - The hostages' faces are smudged, their eyes blank, their voices flat with despair as they beg the Philippine government to pull back its troops from around the Muslim rebel hide-out where they are held. "I'm not sure if I will come out of here," hostage Roland Ullah says, breaking down into sobs inside the makeshift cage. The 21 hostages, snatched last month from a Malaysian diving resort, tell Associated Press reporters that they and their captors fled a military assault on their previous base by crawling through the forest on their hands and knees.

LOVE BUG: FBI obtains e-mail logs of computer virus's creator

MANILA, Philippines - FBI agents are investigating logs of messages sent by people victimized by the "ILOVEYOU" computer virus to its creator, who used Philippine e-mail addresses, a Philippine Internet service provider said Sunday. Jose Carlotta, chief operating officer at Access Net, said he gave six to seven pages of e-mail logs to FBI agents on Saturday. SUPER-FAST INTERNET: Consumers gain from competitive technologies

NEW ORLEANS - Tired of the ticktock of their home computer clock trying to download a large file or video clip, millions of people are turning up the speed on their Web connection. Consumers are benefiting from competition among cable, telephone, wireless and satellite companies offering Internet access that is dozens of times quicker than today's dial-up modems. As cable executives meet this week in New Orleans for their annual convention, they can take some credit for the race that has won over consumers like Zach Hamm, a security consultant in Raleigh, N.C.

WASHINGTON - Serious crimes reported to the police dropped for the eighth straight year during 1999 - down 7 percent from the year before and by far the longest-running crime decline on record, the FBI reports. The FBI's preliminary figures for 1999 extended a trend begun in 1992 that is now nearly three times longer than the second-longest decline - the three years from 1982 through 1984. Northern Ireland election at stake in negotiations

Belfast

Britain signalled Monday it may postpone Northern Ireland's legislative elections unless it nails down clearly worded peace commitments from the Irish Republican Army this week.

Senior British and Irish government ministers talked in Belfast before reopening negotiations with Sinn Fein, the IRA-linked party, on a day when campaigning officially began for the planned May 29 ballot.

Britain said the point of the vote, to elect legislators capable of reviving a joint Catholic-Protestant administration for this British territory, would be doomed to failure unless the outlawed IRA strengthened its commitments to peace and full disarmament.

Sinn Fein leader Gerry Adams opened his campaign in the town of Omagh, scene of a 1998 dissident IRA bomb that killed 29 people. Adams insisted the IRA's position was clear, if still unpublished and he accused Britain of reducing negotiations over a proposed IRA statement "to a game of Scrabble" and insisted the election proceed without delay.

Confident Blair tells party to brace for a challenge

London

British Prime Minister Tony Blair put himself on a new collision course with the Labour left wing Monday as he vowed to face down mounting opposition inside the party to his plans to reform Britain's public services.

A confident-looking Blair told Labour to brace itself for its "biggest challenge" so far -- that of improving hospitals, schools and the criminal justice and asylum systems.

Brushing aside warnings from union leaders and backbenchers who suspect his crusade for more "choice and diversity" in health and education will create two-tier public services, Blair said Labour would betray the nation if it ducked thorough reform.

Schroeder hints he may resign in plea to party

WORLD REPORT

Berlin

Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder issued a veiled threat Monday to resign if his party refused to back his "Agenda 2010" package of controversial reforms designed to slim down the welfare state and give desperately needed impetus to the economy.

Facing down a rebellion from the left wing of his Social Democrats, Schroeder is having to pull out all the stops to assert his authority within the party. The one concession he has had to make is to hold an extraordinary national party conference this summer to decide on the reforms.

He met the party leadership Monday after warning that he expected his colleagues' full support.

No takers as 'Old Europe' presses on with summit

Paris

The four European countries most hostile to the war in Iraq meet in Brussels today to rekindle plans for a European defence force to rival NATO and show America that "Old Europe" is down but not out.

France, Germany, Belgium and Luxembourg, dubbed Old Europe by Donald Rumsfeld, the U.S. Defense Secretary, invited other EU countries to attend, but found no takers.

Most of Europe is too concerned with the future of NATO and the damage wrought to Europe's transatlantic relationship to press for a European army.

The summit was called by Belgium months ago when France and Germany believed they could talk the U.S. into delaying the invasion of Iraq.

The summit's agenda reflects an ambition to establish Europe as a diplomatic and military counterweight to the U.S. That ambition has been fuelled rather than sapped by the war.

Naked crowd of 600 fills London Selfridges store

London

An enthusiastic crowd of around 600 previously unacquainted adults stripped in the name of art at the Oxford Street department store Selfridges in central London Monday.

They came in all shapes, sizes and ages. Some were youthful and toned. Others were plump and greying. There were tall ones, skinny ones, white, brown and black ones.

The congregation of the great undressed began gathering at 6 a.m. to be part of an installation by the American artist Spencer Tunick.

Participants divested themselves of their clothing and their inhibitions to be photographed in various poses on the escalators and in the cosmetics, lingerie and accessories departments.

Pakistan makes overture to end Kashmir dispute

Islamabad, Pakistan

Less than two weeks after India's prime minister offered to hold talks with Pakistan, Islamabad made its own peace overture to New Delhi on Monday, proposing visits between their leaders in an effort to ease decades-long tensions over the disputed Kashmir region.

Pakistani Prime Minister Zafarullah Khan Jamali called his Indian counterpart Atal Bihari Vajpayee and asked "to resolve outstanding issues through dialogue," according to Pakistan Television.

Jamali also said Pakistani officials are willing to visit India and invited Indian officials to visit Pakistan "in the cause of peace," the report said.

People-smuggling forum opens amid tight security

Bali, Indonesia

Discussing how cracking down on illegal immigration in the Asia-Pacific region could also help in the fight against terrorism was high on the agenda for delegates meeting for a conference on people-smuggling that started Monday.

Security was tight for the three-day meeting on the Indonesian vacation island of Bali, which came after a bomb ripped through Jakarta's international airport injuring 11 people.

Dozens of armed police patrolled the seaside resort hosting the meeting and delegates went through tight checks before being allowed into the conference hall.

Government officials met behind closed doors Monday to finalize the conference's agenda and discuss progress in combatting people smuggling since the first such conference in February 2002.

Argentina's ex-president, rival to battle in run-off

Buenos Aires

Former president Carlos Menem led Peronist rival Nestor Kirchner in Sunday's presidential vote, but official results indicated the race was too close to call and Argentina would hold its first run-off in history.

With 26 per cent of the ballot tallied, Menem led with 24 per cent of the vote, ahead of the 22 per cent for Kirchner, the governor of the oil-rich Patagonian province of Santa Cruz. Ricardo Lopez Murphy, a free-market economist and former economy minister, trailed in third with 17 per cent.

All three sought to shape the bitter contest around their prescriptions for leading South America's second-largest economy out of a debt default and bruising currency devaluation.

Chavez calls for massive Latin American trade bloc

Recife, Brazil

Latin America should form its own massive trading bloc if the U.S. fails to give concessions for poor developing countries in negotiations to create a trade zone stretching from Alaska to Argentina, Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez says.

Chavez has a name for the zone: ALBA, the Spanish acronym for Bolivarian Alternative for the Americas.

WORLD REPORT

Chavez's hero is Simon Bolivar, whose victories over Spain liberated Venezuela, Bolivia, Panama, Colombia, Ecuador and Peru. Alba means "dawn" in Spanish.

The U.S. and Brazil are spearheading negotiations to create a 34-country Free Trade Area of the Americas that would become the world's largest trading zone. But Brazilian leaders have warned they will not proceed unless the U.S. reduces trade barriers.

Internet law forces grad student to move research

Detroit

A new Michigan law aimed at preventing illegal copyright infringement has compelled University of Michigan grad student Niels Provos to move his Internet security research project offshore.

The law, patterned after the U.S. federal Digital Millennium Copyright Act, prohibits the knowing possession of any device or software that conceals "the existence or place of origin or destination of any telecommunications service."

The passage of the Michigan law caused Provos concern that his research on steganography (a technique for concealing messages) and "honeypots" (a method of detecting hackers) were in technical violation.

Provos moved his research from a U.S. server to one in the Netherlands and has taken steps to prevent U.S. residents from using the site.

Michigan is one of six states to pass such legislation and several other states are considering similar laws.

If broadly interpreted, such laws might extend to basic Internet security measures like firewalls and encryption technologies, although such an outcome may never have been contemplated by legislators.

Boy, 12, fatally shot after neighbourhood cleanup

Chicago

A 12-year-old boy was gunned down by gang members after he and other children had just finished cleaning up their neighbourhood, police said.

Authorities were questioning three "persons of interest" in the shooting, police spokesman Matthew Jackson said. The victim, Rene Guillen, apparently was mistakenly shot by the gang members, Jackson said.

Witnesses said several youths, at least one of them riding a bicycle, fired shots at a group of kids who had been participating in the neighbourhood cleanup program Saturday.

"This is a case where the victim was just a victim," Jackson said, adding that no one had been arrested. "Here you have a minor who was shot down by gang members who were shooting at rival gang members who had been fighting in the area for weeks."

Rev. Ed Shea of St. Joseph's Church said the boy's family had recently moved to the neighbourhood. His parents do not speak English and refused to be interviewed.

"I feel sorry for the family," Rubio said. "They have no money, so we're trying to help them find a way to pay for the funeral."

Fire at National Archives center was set, officials say

A fire that destroyed thousands of pages of records at a National Archives storage center just outside Washington was intentionally set, investigators say.

"The investigation has revealed that the fire was of suspicious origin," Mike Campbell, a spokesman for the Baltimore division of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, said Friday.

The fire occurred Feb. 29 at the Washington National Records Center in Suitland, Md., which stores more than 3.7 million cubic feet of records. Archives officials initially believed that as many as 700,000 pages were damaged or destroyed. But Susan Cooper, a spokeswoman for the archives, said it now appears that fewer than 40,000 pages were actually destroyed.

The bulk of the records kept in the area where sprinklers went off were inactive files of deceased war veterans from the Department of Veterans Affairs.

FBI stands behind charges against immigration official

The FBI, contradicting a newspaper report, said Friday it stood by its charges that a U.S. immigration official violated the Espionage Act by leaking secret information and lying about his contacts with Cuban government officials.

The Miami Herald reported Friday that Immigration and Naturalization Service officer Mariano Faget might not have been spying for the Cuban government as originally suspected. But FBI officials said he still violated the Espionage Act by leaking secret information and lying about his contacts with Cuban officials.

Rwandan pastor accused in massacre is deported

A Rwandan clergyman accused of taking part in the massacre of refugees in his homeland was deported from the United States on Friday to face a U.N. tribunal in Africa.

Elizaphan Ntakirutimana, a 75-year-old former Seventh Day Adventist pastor, is the first person arrested on U.S. soil to be turned over to a U.N. tribunal, said Assistant U.S. Attorney Don DeGabrielle in Houston.

He is accused of luring refugees into his Rwandan church, where they were massacred. If convicted, Ntakirutimana faces a maximum penalty of life in prison.

Ntakirutimana has been charged with genocide and crimes against humanity by the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda, based in neighboring Tanzania. He was arrested in 1996 in Laredo, Texas, where he had been living.

Class action status is denied in suit against market chain

A federal judge has refused class action status in a sex discrimination case brought against Publix Super Markets Inc. on behalf of thousands of female workers.

The 11 women who sued Publix in 1997 did not prove they had sufficient "commonality," or similar circumstances, and so must proceed with cases individually, U.S. District Judge Henry Adams ruled this week.

The women were trying to represent all female employees who work or formerly worked at three Publix manufacturing plants and eight warehouses and distribution centers in Florida. The plaintiffs claimed that the Lakeland-based chain discriminated in hiring and promotion practices since 1991.

Tyson executive asks appeals court for new trial

A Tyson Foods executive convicted of providing illegal gifts to former Agriculture Secretary Mike Espy asked an appeals court Friday to give him a new trial so Espy can testify in his behalf.

Espy, who didn't testify at Archie Schaffer's trial last June, was awaiting a trial of his own at the time on corruption charges. He was subsequently acquitted.

Schaffer's attorney, Bill Jeffress, told the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia that there was no way to get Espy to testify for Schaffer while his own case was pending.

U.S. District Judge James Robertson agreed in December to give Schaffer a new trial, saying Espy's testimony would likely result in Schaffer's acquittal, but Independent Counsel Donald Smaltz appealed the decision.

State Senate endorses bill on built-in gun locks

NATION &amp; WORLD BRIEFS

The Maryland state Senate gave preliminary approval Friday to a proposal that would make Maryland the first state in the nation to require that all new handguns be sold with built-in locks.

Beginning in 2003, all new handguns sold in Maryland would have to have built-in mechanical locks that opened by combination or with a key. Until then, Maryland would join four other states in mandating that new pistols and revolvers be sold with separate trigger locks.

But the legislation does not require Maryland gun dealers to sell personalized, smart guns that allow only authorized users to fire them. Gov. Parris N. Glendening had made that a centerpiece of his gun control package this year but was unable to gain enough support in the Senate.

The Senate will take a final vote Monday on the weakened version of Glendening's proposal. The compromise package was brokered just 30 minutes before the start of Friday's Senate session to avert a filibuster. Both sides predict it will pass.

The leader of Northern Ireland's main Protestant party said Friday that he is confident of surviving a leadership challenge this weekend, but a close contest could encourage further infighting about the course of the peace process.

The Rev. Martin Smyth, who is challenging Ulster Unionist Party leader David Trimble, says the key issue is the disarmament of the Irish Republican Army.

Britain suspended Northern Ireland's fledgling Protestant-Catholic administration in February to prevent Trimble from leading an Ulster Unionist walkout over the IRA's refusal to begin disposing of its weaponry.

Smyth has said he would not take the party back into the administration unless the IRA first starts disarming. Trimble has indicated more flexibility, saying in Washington earlier this month that the government could be restored if the IRA issued a firm pledge to disarm.

Muslim rebels threaten to kill hostages

Muslim extremists accused authorities Friday of abducting 11 relatives of their rebel chief and warned that they will kill 51 of their hostages if the relatives are not freed. "We will not hesitate to execute all the hostages," said Abu Ahmad, a spokesman of the rebel Abu Sayyaf group.

The hostages held by the rebels at a jungle hide-out on the southern island of Basilan include a Catholic priest and students and teachers seized from two schools on Monday.

Ahmad said followers of Basilan Gov. Wahab Akbar raided the house of rebel leader Khadaffy Janjalani early Friday and abducted his wife, their 1-year-old daughter, his mother and seven other relatives. Another relative was abducted by men in police uniforms riding in an ambulance on Thursday, apparently to force the Abu Sayyaf group to release their 51 hostages, Ahmad said. Akbar's spokesman, Hader Glang, denied involvement in any kidnapping.

The transatlantic web of official conspiracy surrounding John Lennon since his death nearly 20 years ago started unraveling in an almost-deserted Courtroom 23 in the Los Angeles federal court building on Friday afternoon.

The critical moment came when Brian Q. Robbins, a noted hard-line judge in defence of citizens' rights against the state, finally lost patience with the Federal Bureau of Investigation and ordered it to release two files of secret surveillance operations on the former Beatle.

These faded slips of paper could have profound implications, not only for music fans who believe their hero was nearly destroyed by shadowy government agencies, but also for past and future relations between American and British intelligence networks.

The FBI is expected to appeal against the decision, but the dam of official secrecy has been breached and three of the last 10 documents held by the FBI in a Washington basement since the early 1970s are set to see the light of day. The final seven are almost certain to follow.

The agency has spent hundreds of thousands of dollars trying to keep them secret because, it says, the information they contain belongs to a "foreign power." The unstated fact is that the documents are a summary of British intelligence (MI5) files.

Evidence put before Robbins indicates that not only was Lennon and his wife, Yoko Ono, spied on by the FBI under the direct orders of its director, J. Edgar Hoover, acting on the wishes of President Richard Nixon, but he was also monitored by Special Branch and MI5 for years before he moved to the U.S.

The files are being squeezed out of the agency a page at a time by Jon Wiener, a deceptively mild-mannered history professor from the University of California. He began his campaign to explore relations between the musician and the authorities a few weeks after Lennon was gunned down outside his New York home in 1980.

"It began out of simple curiosity, a desire to check out a few rumours that Hoover was not Lennon's greatest fan. It then started snowballing into a crusade when I realized how many obstacles were being thrown in my path," the academic said last week.

The Beatle and the spying game: John Lennon was considered a key target by the FBI and British intelligence

"I knew the FBI had files on Lennon because Hoover collected dirt on all celebrities, partly to protect himself and his political allies and partly to sate his morbid curiosity about people's sex lives. But I never realized how many man-hours were wasted following John and Yoko around.

"At least in the United States we have a Freedom of Information Act, so we have the right to see such papers, which is something that cannot yet happen in Britain."

It was at the height of the anti-Vietnam war protest movement in the early 1970s that Lennon and Ono became key targets for the FBI. Nixon felt cowed and trapped inside the White House as thousands of hippies swarmed outside in the largest demonstrations since the death of Martin Luther King.

Both the president and Hoover believed that the outspoken Lennon and his "weird" wife Ono, fresh from their Amsterdam "sleep-in for peace," were poisoning the minds of American youth. They were therefore a legitimate target for surveillance and, if possible, eviction from the country.

In 1972 in the middle of a 15- month period of intense surveillance, documents uncovered by Wiener show the FBI even orchestrated a police raid in New York that, conveniently, found a small quantity of cannabis that could have been used to end the star's attempts to become an American citizen.

The 10 remaining files will reveal the British role in the FBI's operation, said Wiener, whose campaign is being underwritten by the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU).

Mark Rosenbaum of the ACLU said: "We think a lot of it is probably 30-year-old trivia, but the way the FBI is behaving you'd think releasing the documents would spark war between the United States and Great Britain."

Robbins has been studying Wiener's petitions for at least three years, when the last batch of FBI documents were made public. It is believed, however, that the key that turned the final lock was an affidavit faxed over to his courtroom last week by David Shayler, the former MI5 officer.

Shayler, a fugitive in France after revealing MI5 secrets, declared that in 1993 he saw MI5 files on Lennon. The former spy told the judge how, in 1993, he read an MI5 file with the results of a surveillance operation carried out on Lennon in the late 1960s, shortly before he moved to New York. It is believed one of the two files before the judge concerned information from an MI5 "mole" who had infiltrated the far left of British politics.

According to the file, the millionaire rock star gave 45,000 pounds, the equivalent of 400,000 pounds today, to left-wing groups including the Workers' Revolutionary party (WRP), in which actress Vanessa Redgrave and her brother, Corin, were leading lights, and the Irish Republican Army.

Officers from MI5's F branch were already carrying out surveillance on the WRP, which was regarded as a serious threat to democracy in Britain. It had a "deep throat" within the organization, possibly the very person to whom Lennon talked. This, to MI5, made him a legitimate target. They wanted to know whether he was conspiratorial or just naive.

To this end, they opened a general file on him, including newspaper clippings and snatches of gossip.

Approached Britons

It appears also to have included a handwritten version of the lyrics to Lennon's most overtly political song, Working Class Hero. He had sent the sheet as a gift to the WRP and it was intercepted by MI5's agent in the party. These days, the lyrics would be worth thousands of dollars at auction.

In the early 1970s, when Lennon started worrying the FBI, the Washington agency approached its British colleagues for background information. The request, however, put MI5 into a quandary.

The Beatle and the spying game: John Lennon was considered a key target by the FBI and British intelligence

Lennon's anti-Vietnam activities were unsettling the American authorities and Nixon was anxious to discredit him. MI5 had, in principle, no problem with that, but it feared that any information it handed over could endanger its mole within the WRP.

A compromise was reached in Curzon Street, then MI5's intelligence headquarters in central London, and a summary of Lennon's file was sent to the FBI, omitting any details that could compromise the agency. They amounted to little more than a few pages that might encourage but not inflame the FBI, according to American sources.

Certainly, it struck a chord in Washington. Undercover agents tracked the Liverpool-born singer and his wife to Irish bars in New York that were holding fundraising events. Their agents even scribbled down the lyrics of the songs he was performing. They noted that, after the Bloody Sunday shootings in 1972, he proclaimed: "If it's a choice between the IRA and the British Army, I'm with the IRA."

It is the transatlantic link that the FBI feels honour-bound to protect. Earlier files on Lennon have been declassified as the agents died or, in one case, changed their minds and wanted their work for the FBI acknowledged. There is no way of knowing about the current status of the WRP mole, although he or she is unlikely still to be active.

The left-wing group has shrunk to a mere faction in recent years, especially since its much-publicized split from other British Marxists in 1985. And, as a final nail in its coffin, Vanessa Redgrave proclaimed in 1997 she would be voting Liberal Democrat in the general election.

MI5 is likely to be angered by the Los Angeles court decision. It will confirm old-guard suspicions that any information passed to the U.S. in confidence will, sooner or later, be made public and could rebound on them.

On the other hand, Shayler's revelations demonstrate that MI5 is not leak-proof. The final victim of all this hotheaded paranoia was Lennon. The battle to stay in the United States, which he finally won in 1974, undermined his physical and mental health and, say biographers, sent him on a "lost weekend" of drugs and women in Los Angeles that lasted through the mid-1970s.

Wiener said: "The spying game corrupted the intelligence services, but it broke John Lennon."

For utter revenge, little surpasses the literary beating the Irish have inflicted on the English, taking their language and besting them at it over the past century.

The smallish island has produced four Nobel Prize winners in literature over the past 80 years, not to mention a disproportionate amount of celebrated works.

So when St. Patrick's Day celebrants gather Monday to wear funny hats and down green beer, they ought to toast the wordsmiths of Dublin, too.

The city seethes with words still, making a cellphone franchise here pure gold. The Irish love to talk, opine and philosophize, often carrying on parallel conversations, on the phone and face-to-face, simultaneously.

The Hamilton Spectator

As British theatre critic Kenneth Tynan once observed, "The English hoard words like misers; the Irish spend them like sailors."

While the literary tradition is carefully preserved and annotated in places like the Dublin Writers Museum, it is lived and breathed on the Dublin Literary Pub Crawl.

In a fairly tight radius, you can visit the drinking spots of luminaries such as James Joyce, Oscar Wilde, Sean O'Casey and Brendan Behan, enjoy scenes and passages played out by two actors and enjoy the odd "ball of malt," as creamy pints of Guinness are called.

And what a cast of characters, meaning the writers, is revealed. At McDaid's, for instance, there is the opportunity for a score of stories about Behan, "the drinker with a writing problem."

The author of The Borstal Boy was one brawlin' boyo, spitting words like bullets and generally creating havoc wherever he set on a bar stool.

Behan, a one-time Irish Republican Army member, once explained the inanity of pubs creating snugs, the private booths where ladies would be spared the coarse attentions of male drinkers.

"Your average Irishman," he declared, "would crawl over seven naked women for a pint and not take notice."

The Wordsmiths of Dublin

Behan even has a Canadian connection, crawlers learn.

After drying out in a New Jersey institution while on tour of North America in the late 1950s, he crashed from the wagon spectacularly in Toronto.

He told an interviewer that Toronto "will be a nice place when they get it finished." And there wasn't much street fighter left in him when police arrested him for disturbing the peace.

"He's soft, not much muscle on him," reported a policeman who put the clamps on him.

No wonder with breakfasts like this, as described by fellow writer J.P. Donleavy, who penned The Ginger Man.

"Take a large mixing bowl. Throw in one helping of corn flakes, one tin of peaches, half a jar of tomato chutney, a square of cottage cheese, a tin of sardines, two pieces of black pudding, some chipped bacon rind, one slice of bread, a handful of flour, some salt, sugar and a cup of milk.

"Pour a bottle of Guinness over the above and mix frantically with a wooden spoon. Consume (preferably naked) straight from the bowl in massive mouthfuls."

Donleavy noted that Behan was naked at the time after a swim. When he finished the mixture, the legendary drinker said, "As you know, I always look after my health." Another time, he was awakened from slumber while appearing on an American talk show and asked a question on the topic of sex.

"As long as it doesn't disturb the horses," he replied.

For every wild man like Behan in the Irish literary galaxy, of course, there were utter abstainers like George Bernard Shaw and subdued personalities like W.B. Yeats.

Taken by a friend to experience a public house, Yeats took a sip of his sherry and announced: "I have now seen a pub. Can you take me home?"

Clearly he preferred the pastoral "bee-loud glade" of his writing to the boisterous pub environment.

Ironically, teetotaler Shaw is enshrined in several establishments he wouldn't dare set foot in; and Behan is fondly recalled in several pubs that banished him for life, one for arranging a stool around a rival's head.

O'Neills in Sutton Street is part of the tour, and it is here that Samuel Beckett apparently retreated rather than attend classes.

"Beckett spent more time at O'Neills and on the cricket pitch than he did at Trinity," the guide explains.

At Trinity, by the way, the hosts treat the pub crawlers to an scene from Wilde's The Importance of Being Earnest and an anecdote of Wilde's lecture tour of the United States in 1882.

He was bizarrely scheduled to bring culture to the silver miners of Ledville in Colorado and bravely carried through with a lecture on interior design.

"With their huge sombre hats, scarlet shirts and knee-high boots they reminded me of the 17th century Cavaliers," Wilde wrote. "Indeed, I think they were the only well-dressed men I have met since my arrival in the United States. I spoke to these delightful fellows about the early schools of Florentine painting and they slept peacefully."

A subtext to Wilde's account was what happened later that night, according to our guide's account.

The miners offered to show Wilde a mine shaft and took several bottles of whiskey with them, thinking they'd show this fop up by getting him drunk and leaving him there overnight.

The Wordsmiths of Dublin

Apparently, Wilde was a champion drinker, though, and outlasted the miners, even having to operate the lift to get them back up the shaft. He is remembered in Dublin by a statue in Merrion Square about 75 metres from where he was born. Wilde reclines on a slab of rock, a smile on one side of his face, a frown on the other.

With typical Irish irreverence, it's been coined The Fag on the Crag, a reference to the spectacular British libel case which revealed his homosexuality.

Wilde, by the way, may have had one of history's great parting lines.

As he lie dying in Paris, his eyes surveyed the walls of his room and he is reported to have said, "I knew that wallpaper would be the death of me."

Another stop is the Palace Bar in Fleet Street, dating back to 1828 and where editors of the Irish Times once ran the paper from the back room, which was called the Intensive Care Unit.

Flann O'Brien, author of The Third Policeman, was a regular here and wore a velvet glove when he drank.

Asked why, he said, "I swore to my mother on her death bed that I'd never touch a glass of whiskey."

The pub crawl begins in the top floor bar of the Duke on Duke Street, and the tone is set quickly with a scene from Beckett's Waiting For Godot and an explanation of Joyce's links to the Duke and Davy Byrne's across the street.

In Joyce's masterpiece Ulysses, Bryne's is where Leopold Bloom enjoys his lunch of a gorgonzola cheese sandwich with a glass of burgundy.

Several pubs are featured in Ulysses and what is remarkable, our guide notes, is that Joyce detailed all the landmarks while writing his novel in Paris.

He would write to friends asking for information to flesh out his epic, items like what was the name of the pub at such and such corner and what did they call the bakery down the street from it.

Which brings to mind one of the writer's stinging volleys of a question by a hostile interviewer.

Asked what he did during the First World War, Joyce replied, "I wrote Ulysses. What did you do?"

Another stop along the way offered a scene from James Plunkett's Strumpet City, the novel detailing labour unrest in Dublin in the early 1900s.

In it, character Rashers Tierney and another street person debate the best methods of begging for coins and how to size up a likely contributor. Tierney offers the difference between a prosperous Catholic and a rich Protestant.

"The Protestant is fat, too, but doesn't look it."

The scene is in sharp contrast with booming Dublin, a city with pubs and restaurants full to overflowing.

This night the pub crawl visited The Old Stand, arguably the oldest pub in Ireland. It was granted a licence by Charles II in 1659, but there's a suggestion libations were offered at this spot for 200 years before that.

You could just snake an arm through a crowd to get a pint and pay for it here. Better to revisit during the day and savour the atmosphere and the wonderful Irish stew.

Other ways to celebrate the Irish literary heritage are to visit the James Joyce Centre, the James Joyce Museum in a historic tower nine miles south of Dublin or the extensive collection of memorabilia at the Dublin Writer's Museum.

For a different take on Dublin, you might want to try the Rock 'n' Roll Stroll, a journey that takes you to spots where U2, The Cranberries and The Corrs began their music careers. The yarns, if they exist, are nearly as rollicking as those of the writers.

Chechen snipers in high-rise buildings and trenches fired fiercely at Russian troops trying to advance on the center of Grozny on Thursday, while a rain of Russian bombs and rockets blanketed the capital in thick smoke. International pressure was building on Russia to end the war, with U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan saying in Moscow that he wants the conflict to end as soon as possible. The Council of Europe's parliamentary assembly called for Russia to open cease-fire talks and to halt attacks on civilians, but rejected proposals to suspend Russia. The Russians have been struggling to seize Grozny for a month, and have concentrated for the past week on Minutka Square. Taking the square would give federal forces leverage for pushing rebels out of the center. (RUSSIA-CHECHNYA)

WASHINGTON (AP)

President Bill Clinton, in his final State of the Union address Thursday, will encourage Russia and China to join the world's ranks of free, prosperous democratic nations. Clinton is expected to urge Russia to safeguard its nuclear arsenal and will prod Congress to give China most-favored-nation trade status, National Security Adviser Sandy Berger said Thursday. Clinton also will propose a $350 billion tax cut, urging relief from a tax penalty married couples pay and a new program of retirement savings accounts. The president also will propose big tax breaks for education, including a deduction of up to $10,000 for college tuition. Details of his proposals were released Wednesday in advance of the address before a joint session of Congress. The president will say the United States stands at a moment of great prosperity and promise, and will urge Americans to take a long look ahead to the challenges of the 21st century, White House chief of staff John Podesta said. VIENNA, Austria (AP)

Faced with an international outcry over the prospect of a far-right party in government, Austria's president said Thursday he would wait until next week before deciding whether to ask the two conservative groups to try to form a new coalition. The Austrian People's Party has been negotiating with Joerg Haider's rightist Freedom Party since Tuesday after failing last week to renew its 13-year coalition with the Social Democrats. International leaders have called the negotiations a journey into Europe's darkest history. Haider rose to international prominence about 10 years ago following controversial statements about Austria's Nazi past. In 1991, he praised Adolf Hitler's "orderly employment policy" and four years later lauded veterans of the Waffen SS as "decent people of good character." "I believe the reactions are exaggerated," said Deputy Foreign Minister Benita Ferrero-Waldner, a People's Party

MIAMI (AP)

Elian Gonzalez's father told U.S. immigration officials that his Miami relatives offered him millions of dollars, a house and a car to join the 6-year-old boy in the United States, according to court papers filed Thursday. "I could go there with all my family and would be taken care and could have a job if I wanted to work, but with the money offered I would not need to do so," the father said. "That's when I hung up the telephone." The U.S. government filed the papers in response to a lawsuit filed by the boy's Miami relatives, who are challenging an order that Elian be sent back to live with his father in Cuba. In its 400-page response, the government argued that the federal courts have no right to intervene and that allowing Elian to stay would undermine efforts to get other countries to return abducted American children. (US-CUBAN BOY-LAWSUIT)

BELFAST, Northern Ireland (AP)

Warning that the Irish Republican Army is unlikely to start disarming soon, Sinn Fein leader Gerry Adams appealed Thursday for Protestant politicians to be patient and not pull the plug on Northern Ireland's power-sharing government. Adams said it was proving extremely difficult to persuade the outlawed group to disarm in support of the Good Friday peace accord, but he "will continue to try and bring this about." Last month Sinn Fein received two posts in a new 12-member Cabinet for Northern Ireland long the central goal of the 1998 accord after the Cabinet's senior Protestant member, Ulster Unionist Party leader David Trimble, persuaded his party to drop its demand for some IRA disarmament in advance. Trimble's concession fueled widespread expectations that the IRA would finally identify its hidden weapons dumps in response. The IRA did open negotiations with a Belfast-based disarmament commission founded three years ago for that purpose. The commission's chairman, Canadian Gen. John de Chastelain, is supposed to present a progress report Monday to the British and Irish governments. Expectations that it will confirm any specific IRA commitments are running low. All street and shop signs here, by Quebec provincial law, must be in French. But walk a few blocks from the modest bachelor apartment at 1250 Fort Street where Ahmed Ressam lived under the name of Benni Antoine Noris, and sometimes Mario Roig, and the signs tell of a rich ethnic bouillabaisse.

Here is Boutique Ali, a shoe repair shop, next to Bombay Palace-Cuisine Indienne, and then, in quick succession, Thai, Chinese, Italian, Russian and Swiss restaurants, as well as two Middle Eastern groceries and "Pandit A. B. Chowdhury, immigrant consultant for refugee claimant."

Since the arrest of Mr. Ressam, an Algerian, near Seattle last week and his indictment Wednesday on charges of trying to smuggle enough bomb-making material into the United States to flatten a building, that rich ethnic mix and the loose immigration controls that have made it possible have come under close scrutiny in Montreal and across Canada.

Officials here have been trying to explain, among other things, how Mr. Ressam managed to remain in the country after his application for asylum was refused, and even after he was arrested on charges of breaking into automobiles -- in the spring of 1998, two months after a nationwide warrant for his deportation was issued.

Mr. Ressam seems to have simply melted into the immigrant community in Montreal, which includes more than 15,000 Algerians, obtaining driver's licenses under his false names and even a Canadian passport last February, a year after the initial deportation order, by using his French-sounding alias and a forged Roman Catholic baptismal certificate. In Quebec, a baptismal certificate is sufficient identification to receive a passport.

Mr. Ressam was not alone. Critics of the government charge that as many as 10,000 people a year who are seeking asylum simply vanish from official view, some smuggling themselves across the porous border into the United States, many apparently disappearing into the population here.

A spokesman for the United States Immigration and Naturalization Service said the United States has had similar problems with asylum seekers, especially those who file for asylum after being charged with violating immigration law. A 1995 study by the I.N.S. found that 90 percent of those vanished while their applications were pending.

Terrorists Said to Hide In Canada's Melting Pot

According to a recent report by Canada's intelligence agency, the Canadian Security Intelligence Service, the country's openness to immigrants has helped make it "a haven for terrorists."

A senior intelligence official told the Toronto Globe and Mail that the agency had begun watching Mr. Ressay shortly after he arrived in early 1994 with a fake French passport and a tale of being falsely accused and tortured by Algeria's military government, which is battling Islamic insurgents. But, he added, the intelligence agency dropped the investigation.

"He has been known to us for some time," the official was quoted as saying in today's issues. "We had to drop it recently because of lack of resources. We just don't have the time and people to continue these investigations indefinitely."

Montreal's Algerians came under closer scrutiny by the city's police last October, when a team of French counterterrorism investigators arrived in Canada. Montreal had experienced a rash of car break-ins around the financial district, with cell phones and laptop computers being stolen and then peddled on the streets.

The French were conducting an investigation based on the arrest of Fateh Kamel, an Algerian Islamic militant, and they wanted to question two men they believed to be his lieutenants -- Mr. Ressay and Karim Said Atmani, who the police now say had been directing the Montreal theft ring. Mr. Ressay was not found.

Mr. Kamel, who had fought with Afghan rebels against the Soviets, was arrested by the authorities in Jordan last spring and extradited to France.

According to the French, Mr. Kamel had been the leader of a band of gangster-terrorists who carried out a series of armed robberies and shootouts around Roubaix in northern France. He had also operated out of Montreal in the 1990's and may have married a Canadian woman, and was believed to have directed a loose group of Islamic terrorists. Some of those terrorists were veterans of fighting in Bosnia, which, like Afghanistan, attracted Arab Muslim volunteers to what they regarded as a holy war.

"I think he was the leader of this group," a senior official of the French police and judicial antiterrorism task force said in Paris. "We have material evidence he conducted this group from Montreal. He moves around -- Bosnia, Syria, Turkey, Saudi Arabia, Jordan."

Mr. Atmani, the other man sought by the French, had been deported last year to Bosnia because he carried a Bosnian passport when he arrived in Montreal as a stowaway on a cargo ship. His whereabouts are unknown, although officials suspect he may have slipped back into Canada.

Last week, the Montreal police arrested 11 men -- most of them Algerians -- who they said had been stealing from parked cars in groups of two and three and extorting money from other Algerians. The police said that part of the proceeds was going to finance the Armed Islamic Group, an Algerian group that has carried out massacres in villages there.

"These guys are financing organizations that train people to assassinate fathers of families, pregnant women, old people and children," said Jean-Yves Mailloux, the head of the Montreal police counterterrorism division.

As the investigation accelerated, the police found a second apartment where they believe Mr. Kamel, Mr. Atmani, Mr. Ressay and two others spent several months together in 1998. It is in Ville d'Anjou, just east of Montreal, near the working-class neighborhood where Mr. Ressay had been preparing to open a small grocery store with a license issued under his identity of Benni Noris.

Investigators also believe they have identified the second man who shared rooms at a motel in Vancouver with Mr. Ressay before he made his ferry trip into the United States. He was said to be Abdul Majid Dahoumane, an Algerian who applied for asylum here in 1995, was refused, and, like Mr. Ressay, was under a deportation order.

Police and intelligence officials say that Canada's generous immigration policies have meant that foreign terror groups can more easily establish and maintain cells here.

Terrorists Said to Hide In Canada's Melting Pot

Last year, the Canadian Security Intelligence Service reported that it had active investigations into 50 terrorist groups and 350 individuals.

The agency's director, Ward Elcock, told the Canadian Senate's security and intelligence committee last year that terrorists have been taking advantage of the system for years and that almost every terrorist group in the world had a foothold in Canada.

"Terrorist groups are present here whose origins lie in every significant regional ethnic and nationalist conflict there is," he said. "The nature of our society and the related policies concerning refugees and immigrants make us particularly vulnerable to terrorist influence and activities."

The intelligence agency's Web site lists a wide variety of foreign groups operating in Canada, including Hezbollah, Hamas, groups from Algeria and Iran, the Tamil Tigers of Sri Lanka, the Irish Republican Army and "all the major Sikh" separatists. It adds that more groups are arriving, including the Kurdish Worker's Party, "trained assassins" from the Palestinian Force 17 and the Iranian intelligence service.

Since 1992, Canada has deported only 11 people as terrorists. Before that, none.

In addition to Canada's general welcome of immigrants, Mr. Rassem was probably helped by official Quebec policy of trying to bring more French-speaking immigrants into the province. Many Algerians speak French as a legacy of French colonial rule.

In 1999, 12,600 French-speaking immigrants were admitted. Next year the number is expected to reach as high as 14,600.

"Quebec has attained its objective of increasing French-speaking immigration," the provincial immigration minister, Robert Perrault, said in a news release last month.

The number of Algerian immigrants increased markedly after 1992, when the Islamic Salvation Front started a bloody insurgency in Algeria after the military canceled elections and seized power. In 1990, 493 refugees and immigrants entered Canada from Algeria; last year the number grew to 1,914. Since 1997, the government has stopped extraditing people to Algeria because of the violence there.

Of 1,197 Algerians who applied for refugee status in 1998, 67 percent were accepted, compared with 40 percent for all refugee groups that year.

Leon Benoit of the opposition Reform Party contended that Canadian authorities cannot account for as many as 10,000 people who claimed refugee status at border points last year. Of 24,000 who made claims, he said, about 10,000 were given refugee status, and 4,000 to 5,000 more were sent away. The whereabouts of the rest, he said, are unknown.

As Russia has tightened its encirclement of the Chechen capital Grozny, keeping up its barrage of punishing air and artillery attacks, Chechen rebels have been turning increasingly to guerrilla tactics, the Russian military said Sunday. It's a dangerous shift for Russia, which had been hoping to avoid a close-fought war for fear of high casualties among its soldiers. "Due to the occupation (by Russian forces) of the greater part of Chechnya and the blockade of strategically important regions, (Chechnya's) illegal armed formations are increasingly using guerrilla methods of warfare," said Col. Gennady Alyokhin, a Russian military spokesman. After Russia began its ground offensive in Chechnya in September, the military was predicting a quick, victorious campaign, saying the militants could be destroyed by the end of the year. But in recent days, the upbeat forecasts have given way to expectations of a longer, harsher war. (RUSSIA-CHECHNYA)

NASA antennas listened in vain Sunday for a signal from the Mars Polar Lander and tense mission officials said after three days of silence, time was running out in the effort to contact the craft. "Clearly the team is getting more frustrated, certainly, and more tense about all of this," said operations manager Richard Cook. The $165 million lander was supposed to have signaled immediately after Friday afternoon's touchdown about 500 miles (800 kms) from the Martian south pole. Failure of the Mars Polar Lander would be a double blow to NASA's Jet Propulsion Laboratory, still smarting from the September loss of its sibling spacecraft, the Mars Climate Orbiter. Four Austrians and one Australian were killed and 16 people remained hospitalized, some in critical condition, after a panicked crowd stampeded out of a stadium following a snowboarding event in western Austria, officials said Sunday. The Austria Press Agency cited police in Innsbruck, capital of the western province of Tyrol, as saying at least 39 people were injured in a crush of panicked spectators leaving the city's Olympic stadium after the "Air and Style" snowboarding event. Five young women aged 14 to 21 were trampled to death, police said. Four of them were Austrian teenagers and the fifth was a 21-year-old Australian visiting from Sydney, the Austria Press Agency reported. AUSTRIA-SNOWBOARD DEATHS

An angry President Fidel Castro demanded Sunday that the United States return a Cuban boy rescued at sea to his father within 72 hours, warning that the Cuban people are losing patience. If not, "there will be millions of people in the streets demanding the boy's freedom," Castro said in comments broadcast on government-controlled radio and television early Sunday. "It is difficult to hold back the population with the state of irritation" generated by the case of 5-year-old Elian Gonzalez, Castro said. He said Elian had been "kidnapped" by the U.S. government and promised a "battle for world opinion" to bring the child home. (CUBA-US-BOY)

TEHRAN, Iran (AP)

Hundreds of Iranian university students, some with their mouths taped shut, staged a peaceful rally Sunday against efforts by Islamic hard-liners to curb freedom of expression. Some 1,000 students took part in the rally, organized by the Islamic Students' Association of the Allameh Tabatabaie University in Central Tehran. The protesters gathered in a university courtyard. Some had their mouths taped shut, with the word "silence" written in Farsi over the tape. Others carried portraits of prominent pro-reform Iranians, like former interior minister and journalist Abdollah Nouri, who was given a five-year jail term by a hard-line court last month on charges that included religious dissent. Herald deputy editor Peter O'Neill, in Britain on a Commonwealth Press Union scholarship, has just ended a week in Northern Ireland, and in 29 engagements, met everyone from politicians and professors to primary school pupils. This is what he found.

Northern Ireland, June 22, 1999. This is the news. Tensions are mounting in this unique community where gorse hedges on rolling farmland are replaced in Belfast and Derry by razor wire and "peace" walls that keep the flocks segregated. Where in central Belfast pubs, people can laugh with feeling but just minutes away on the strictly Protestant Shankill Road or its neighbouring Catholic Falls Road, there is a hardness in the eyes of 10-year-old boys.

Thirty years of violence between those wanting continued union with Britain (mainly Protestants) and those wanting a united Ireland (mainly Catholics) will do that, but now everyone, almost everyone, has had a gutsful.

The celebrated Good Friday Agreement of 1998 was a breakthrough, but now comes the implementation. In the next few weeks, key elements of that implementation are required.

By June 30, Northern Ireland's Assembly, elected 12 months ago, is supposed to be operational. The four main parties, however, have yet to discuss who will hold what ministries.

That is because the Ulster Unionist Party won't sit at the same table as Sinn Fein until that party's paramilitary arm, the Irish Republican Army (IRA), starts handing in its weapons. (Any talks at the moment see the parties in different rooms just in case they happen to meet face-to-face).

Sinn Fein says the Good Friday Agreement does not require decommissioning until next year, but the Unionists are adamant. Many in the UUP already think they have conceded too much, principally through early release of terrorist prisoners, without seeing any return of good faith. What they have seen is the IRA thrice stating it will never disarm, and there are many spray can references around declaring "not one bullet, not one ounce (of explosive)".

With June 30 looming, the intervention of the British and Irish prime ministers seems inevitable.

Just to complicate the issue, marching season has arrived in Northern Ireland. For the vast majority of the 3300 marches held each year, there is no problem, but some are overtly sectarian and antagonistic towards the other side. Mark down July 12 at Drumcree, Portadown, as a very potential flashpoint.

Dramatic step towards peace N Ireland Assembly soon to be up and running

The Protestant Orangemen intend marching through Drumcree to their church and back again, smack through a Catholic area. If they keep to form they will stop outside the Catholic Church, face it, and rile the Catholics with patriotic band tunes. Local residents on either side are entrenched in their views and Drumcree presents a real threat to the peace process.

These are the immediate issues, but there are others. There are bound to be after 30 years of violence in which more than 3600 have been killed. Some of them are:

SEGREGATION: In parts of Northern Ireland, the Catholic and Protestant communities cannot live side by side. In West Belfast gates are locked across roads at night and in the weekends to prevent access between groups. A brick wall has been built in another area to allow each grouping to feel safe from the other. Where communities do meet, the house between them will be empty and derelict. In the second largest city, Derry, residents on one side of the river are 95 per cent Catholic. The 600 Protestant families who remain feel alienated behind a wall topped with razor wire, but to move out would be to admit defeat.

In West Belfast there are separate public transport systems for Protestants and Catholics. It is possible in fact to live never-meeting lives, with separate schools, shops and workplaces. But it is not all like that. In many areas the country's 58 per cent of Protestants and 42 per cent of Catholics are able to live cheek to jowl.

POLICING: Northern Ireland has 8500 police officers, with 4250 full and part-time reserves. With a population of 1.6 million, that's around one cop for every 135 people. There is also a British Army presence.

The biggest problem for the RUC though is that just 8 per cent of the force is Catholic, which creates distrust from the Catholic community. There is a specific commission looking at this as part of the peace process, but it would almost require a law change to allow positive discrimination towards employing more Catholics to redress the balance.

Since the ceasefire there has been an increase in applications to join the RUC from Catholics, remarkable considering such a decision can result in the person having to cut ties from the rest of their family.

Surprisingly the "ordinary" crime rates are low, due to close family units, tight communities and a level of harsh policing by terrorists on both sides against their own. The crime rate seems set to rise though, with a growing drug problem and paramilitary agents brought up on violence looking for other ways to express themselves.

RELEASE of PRISONERS: Under the Good Friday Agreement, those parties which agreed to a ceasefire will have all their prisoners released. So far 123 republicans and 93 loyalists have been freed, with Maze Prison still holding 197 prisoners. None will be left by next July.

This is a sore point for many, particularly victims, with some convicted murderers set to serve as little as two or three years. As well, former terrorists (they would call themselves freedom fighters) who have served time are now prominent politicians.

In Derry, the ornate city council chambers were blown to bits by a man who was elected to serve in the rebuilt chamber 10 years later.

EDUCATION: Most of Northern Ireland's schools are segregated, but as big a problem is the 11-plus examination. All children, at the age of 11, sit a national examination, the results of which determine the student's education path. As one principal described it: "We tell 25 per cent of pupils that they are going to be successful, and 75 per cent, at the age of 11, that they are failures. I think history will judge this as a gross form of child abuse."

UNEMPLOYMENT and the ECONOMY: There has been a dramatic improvement in the rate of unemployment, from 17 per cent in 1986 to 7 per cent now, but in some areas families are in their third generation of unemployment. The economy is propped up from London to the tune of poundstg>>8 billion a year.

The troubles have put off outside investors and strangled a potentially lucrative tourist market, but things are changing.

Dramatic step towards peace N Ireland Assembly soon to be up and running

Very active and positive development boards have already attracted many firms to Northern Ireland, and cranes and rebuilding are evident in the main centres.

So there are hurdles to overcome, and the nation is still holding its breath over real peace, but some real progress has been made. The Good Friday Agreement was a dramatic step forward.

Never before had protagonists from each side sat together and compromised. From Sinn Fein it represented acceptance for the first time that a border really existed. More than 70 per cent of the population indicated they had had enough of violence by endorsing the agreement, and the political leaders recognise this is a real mandate for peace.

Crucial has been the active involvement from neutral countries like the United States, Canada, Finland and other European states.

At grassroots level too, hundreds of community groups are springing up, meeting needs that have never been met before. Women are to the fore in this real force. For the first time, incredibly, victims are being recognised and helped, and the outpouring of anger and outrage has staggered counsellors. An issue here is deciding exactly who the victims are. Are former terrorists victims? What about their children?

In an intense week of tours, interviews and lectures, the best was saved until last. Not a politician, not a civil servant, not a clergyman, nor even a leader from a community group.

At Oakgrove Integrated Primary School, 19 Limavady Road, Derry, an 11-year-old pupil spoke about being a peer mediator in one of the few, but growing number of schools catering for both Protestants and Catholics.

Yes, she said, sometimes religion is mentioned in arguments, but most of the time it is about what one friend did to another, about someone taking someone else's ball. Normal kids stuff really.

And another story, from a girl from a mixed marriage who shifted from a Protestant school to an integrated one. Asked by her mother what the biggest difference was, she replied: "At my other school I couldn't talk about daddy. Now I can be proud of you both."

If these are the future leaders of Northern Ireland, then there is hope.

Belligerent and unbowed, Orange Order leaders say they will mount a second week of violence-prone street protests if the Protestant brotherhood isn't permitted to parade through Portadown's main Catholic neighborhood.

Unrest resumed overnight, with Protestant hard-liners scuffling with police in a few Belfast neighborhoods. The mounting tensions come in advance of Wednesday's massive parades across Northern Ireland, when the Orange Order commemorates a 1690 military triumph over Catholics.

In Portadown, 30 miles southwest of Belfast, an estimated 3,000 Orangemen and supporters marched Sunday until they reached a British army barricade erected to prevent them from reaching nearby Garvaghy Road, where Catholics decry the town's annual Orange parade as offensive.

Hours before the march, a car bomb planted by Irish Republican Army dissidents detonated in Stewartstown, north of Portadown. The blast wounded an officer and demonstrated that Northern Ireland's 1998 peace accord faces threats from both extremes of the community.

Speaking in front of the 20-foot-high steel wall blocking their path, Portadown leaders of the Orange Order promised they would eventually get their way and march down Garvaghy Road by wearing down British authorities through mass civil disobedience.

Portadown's senior Orangeman, Harold Gracey, denied responsibility for encouraging the Protestant riots of recent days then in the same breath called for even more intense demonstrations starting Monday.

Gracey noted that British governments in the past had been forced to change policies when faced with street mayhem. "So I would say to our people: Continue," he said to enthusiastic cheers.

Protestant hooligans took to the streets after dark in several places, pelting police and soldiers with stones and firecrackers. They erected barricades of burning cars and furniture in two Belfast neighborhoods, while police seized nail bombs, slingshots and a dagger following scuffles in Larne to the north.

Britain has insisted it won't back down in the face of Protestant unrest, deploying 2,000 soldiers in Portadown to back up police in case the situation escalates out of control.

Mounting Tensions in Northern Ireland

At the Portadown confrontation zone, soldiers were dropped by helicopter into pastures to drive back Protestants trying to get through barbed-wire coils and invade Garvaghy Road.

The Orange Order represents a sizable chunk of Protestant opinion opposed to the 1998 deal.

Police said the car bomb planted outside an unoccupied police station in Stewartstown was the work of the Real IRA, a dissident group representing IRA members opposed to the outlawed group's 1997 cease-fire.

"The bombers were trying to inflame an already tense situation," said Britain's Northern Ireland Secretary Peter Mandelson.

Martin McGuinness, a former IRA commander who today is a Sinn Fein member of Northern Ireland's power-sharing government, called the bombers "people of no credibility who are locked in the past and have nothing to offer the future."

The annual collision of rights at Portadown where Orangemen insist they have the right to free assembly, Catholic residents to live free of sectarian harassment has defied solution for years. It has triggered widespread violence regardless of whether security forces blocked the parade or forced it through.

Since its formation in 1998 a government-appointed Parades Commission has ordered Portadown Orangemen to stay away from Garvaghy Road. The joint Catholic-Protestant commission this year emphasized the only way it would sanction an Orange parade through the area would be after constructive face-to-face negotiations.

The Orange Order, however, has refused to meet Garvaghy Road residents since Catholic militants there began blocking the annual parade in 1995. Orangemen cite the IRA background of the Catholic protest leader, Breandan MacCionnaith, as justification for rejecting direct talks.

Protestants got their chance to vent their hatred of the Catholic protesters, particularly MacCionnaith, when the Orange parade passed a Catholic church near Garvaghy Road en route to the security-force blockade.

Several Protestants at the tail-end of the march spotted MacCionnaith at the front of a crowd of Catholic onlookers, standing safely behind a row of riot police, gun-toting soldiers and armored cars.

"You IRA scum certainly go out of your way to be offended," shouted one woman.

"We can't get to you now, Breandan, but a bullet'll get you someday," said a teen-age boy.

Belligerent and unbowed, Orange Order leaders say they will mount a second week of violence-prone street protests if the Protestant brotherhood isn't permitted to parade through Portadown's main Catholic neighborhood.

Unrest resumed overnight, with Protestant hard-liners scuffling with police in a few Belfast neighborhoods. The mounting tensions come in advance of Wednesday's massive parades across Northern Ireland, when the Orange Order commemorates a 1690 military triumph over Catholics.

Cars were stolen and torched in a Protestant section of Londonderry, explosives were thrown at police vehicles and there was an attempt to burn a Catholic Church in County Antrim, and automobile showrooms were set afire in three towns.

In Portadown, 30 miles southwest of Belfast, an estimated 3,000 Orangemen and supporters marched Sunday until they reached a British army barricade erected to prevent them from reaching nearby Garvaghy Road, where Catholics decry the town's annual Orange parade as offensive.

Hours before the march, a car bomb planted by Irish Republican Army dissidents detonated in Stewartstown, north of Portadown. The blast wounded an officer and demonstrated that Northern Ireland's 1998 peace accord faces threats from both extremes of the community.

Mounting Tensions in Northern Ireland

Speaking in front of the 20-foot-high steel wall blocking their path, Portadown leaders of the Orange Order promised they would eventually get their way and march down Garvaghy Road by wearing down British authorities through mass civil disobedience.

Portadown's senior Orangeman, Harold Gracey, denied responsibility for encouraging the Protestant riots of recent days then in the same breath called for even more intense demonstrations starting Monday.

Gracey noted that British governments in the past had been forced to change policies when faced with street mayhem. "So I would say to our people: Continue," he said to enthusiastic cheers.

Protestant hooligans took to the streets after dark in several places, pelting police and soldiers with stones and firecrackers. They erected barricades of burning cars and furniture in two Belfast neighborhoods, while police seized nail bombs, slingshots and a dagger following scuffles in Larne to the north.

Britain has insisted it won't back down in the face of Protestant unrest, deploying 2,000 soldiers in Portadown to back up police in case the situation escalates out of control.

At the Portadown confrontation zone, soldiers were dropped by helicopter into pastures to drive back Protestants trying to get through barbed-wire coils and invade Garvaghy Road.

The Orange Order represents a sizable chunk of Protestant opinion opposed to the 1998 deal.

Police said the car bomb planted outside an unoccupied police station in Stewartstown was the work of the Real IRA, a dissident group representing IRA members opposed to the outlawed group's 1997 cease-fire.

"The bombers were trying to inflame an already tense situation," said Britain's Northern Ireland Secretary Peter Mandelson.

Martin McGuinness, a former IRA commander who today is a Sinn Fein member of Northern Ireland's power-sharing government, called the bombers "people of no credibility who are locked in the past and have nothing to offer the future."

The annual collision of rights at Portadown where Orangemen insist they have the right to free assembly, Catholic residents to live free of sectarian harassment has defied solution for years. It has triggered widespread violence regardless of whether security forces blocked the parade or forced it through.

Since its formation in 1998 a government-appointed Parades Commission has ordered Portadown Orangemen to stay away from Garvaghy Road. The joint Catholic-Protestant commission this year emphasized the only way it would sanction an Orange parade through the area would be after constructive face-to-face negotiations.

The Orange Order, however, has refused to meet Garvaghy Road residents since Catholic militants there began blocking the annual parade in 1995. Orangemen cite the IRA background of the Catholic protest leader, Breandan MacCionnaith, as justification for rejecting direct talks.

Protestants got their chance to vent their hatred of the Catholic protesters, particularly MacCionnaith, when the Orange parade passed a Catholic church near Garvaghy Road en route to the security-force blockade.

Several Protestants at the tail-end of the march spotted MacCionnaith at the front of a crowd of Catholic onlookers, standing safely behind a row of riot police, gun-toting soldiers and armored cars.

"You IRA scum certainly go out of your way to be offended," shouted one woman.

"We can't get to you now, Breandan, but a bullet'll get you someday," said a teen-age boy.

Protestant hard-liners angry over restrictions on their traditional July parades mounted mass street protests Monday, forcing shops to close early and inspiring more violence across Northern Ireland.

Mounting Tensions in Northern Ireland

Despite calls for peaceful protests by the leaders of the Orange Order brotherhood, trouble broke out within minutes in Belfast and other towns.

Along the so-called "peace line," a network of fences and walls separating British Protestant and Irish Catholic communities in west Belfast, youths on both sides traded salvos of bottles and rocks.

Twenty-five miles to the southwest in Lurgan, riot police intervened to prevent Protestants from walking into the Catholic side of the town, among the most bitterly polarized in Northern Ireland.

Business leaders ordered shops in Belfast's normally bustling downtown to close an hour before the protests to allow workers time to get away. Shops closed early in other towns where clashes were expected.

The mass exodus of motorists meant that when groups of Orangemen and their supporters began rallying in predominantly Protestant parts of Belfast some carrying placards reading "Respect our culture, restore our rights" they had comparatively little traffic to snarl.

Units of riot police and British army helicopters kept watch from a distance over the progress of the biggest Protestant crowds.

British army bomb-disposal experts investigated suspicious packages and abandoned cars. One was parked on a key overpass above the major highway north of Belfast, forcing traffic to be diverted to secondary roads.

Experts conducted a controlled explosion of a package left outside the home of a Protestant member of the government-appointed Parades Commission, which since 1998 has ordered restrictions on traditional Orange Order demonstrations that pass near or through Catholic areas. No explosives were found inside the package.

Motorists driving to suburbs south of Belfast reported that youths were trying to force people out of their cars. Successfully hijacked vehicles were soon burning in Protestant parts of north Belfast, too.

David Trimble, the Protestant leader of Northern Ireland's new power-sharing government and an Orangeman himself, warned that anyone committing violence this week "will only bring dishonor and disgrace on the cause they profess to support."

Trimble, who rose to prominence in 1995 by championing the right of Orangemen to continue parading annually through the main Catholic section of Portadown, today argues that the town's Orange leaders should drop their refusal to enter direct negotiations with the Parades Commission and Garvaghy Road protesters.

"I have to say this is the only way in which the issue will be resolved," Trimble said.

Other Orange parades scheduled for Wednesday the 310th anniversary of the triumph of Protestant King William of Orange over his Catholic foe, James II also have been ordered to stay away from predominantly Catholic villages and the Lower Ormeau enclave of south Belfast.

And in neighboring Portadown, the mostly Protestant town at the center of debate over Orange Order parades, riot police armed with shields, clubs and attack dogs pushed demonstrators out of an intersection. The crowd responded by pelting police with rocks and bottles and torching a stolen car.

Business leaders in Belfast, Portadown and several smaller towns advised shops to close an hour before the protests to allow workers enough time to get away. Almost everyone followed the advice, as normally bustling shopping precincts became ghost towns by 4 p.m.

The business leaders condemned Orange tactics, saying the Protestant fraternal group was placing its own disputed right to march past hostile Catholic neighborhoods above everyone else's rights.

"Most businessmen didn't want to close their premises, and certainly do not support what the Orangemen are doing, but they had a duty to ensure that their staff could get home safely," said Bill Jeffrey, chairman of the Northern Ireland Small Businesses Federation.

The mass exodus of motorists meant that when groups of Orangemen and their supporters began rallying in predominantly Protestant parts of Belfast some carrying placards reading "Respect our culture, restore our rights" they had comparatively little traffic to snarl.

Units of riot police and British army helicopters kept watch from a distance over Protestant crowds blocking roads. Each protest ranged in size from a few dozen to several hundred. Some were composed mostly of women and children, while others had a more threatening air, with anti-Catholic terrorists among the participants.

British army bomb-disposal experts investigated a car that had been hijacked and parked on a key overpass in north Belfast. The alert forced a major highway to be closed for two hours before it could be confirmed the car contained no explosives.

Other Orange parades scheduled for Wednesday the 310th anniversary of the triumph of Protestant King William of Orange over his Catholic foe, James II also have been ordered to stay away from predominantly Catholic villages and the Lower Ormeau enclave of south Belfast.

Hard-line Protestants mounted human road blockades across Northern Ireland on Monday, bringing the province to a tense standstill and provoking running battles with riot police as darkness fell.

Militants hijacked and burned cars in several Belfast neighborhoods as anger over restrictions on traditional Protestant parades flared into violence for the second straight week.

Leaders of the Orange Order brotherhood insisted they had counseled supporters not to destroy property or attack police following Monday's planned four-hour road blockades.

Mounting Tensions in Northern Ireland

"It is essential that the protests are not used by malcontents, who have no real interest in the Orange institution, as a cover for violence," leaders of the 80,000-member fraternal group said in a statement.

"To those who have or would engage in violence, we can only say stop," the statement said. "You are not acting on our behalf. Your actions damage an honorable cause."

Within minutes of the first protests, trouble broke out in Belfast and other towns, and got progressively worse at night. Motorists in several towns were terrorized into handing over their cars to roadside mobs. Police prepared for the worst tried to contain riotous mobs on several fronts.

Along the so-called "peace line," a network of fences and walls separating British Protestant and Irish Catholic communities in west Belfast, youths on both sides traded salvos of bottles and rocks.

On the city's predominantly Protestant east side, soldiers and police blocked a growing crowd from entering Short Strand, an isolated Catholic enclave, where a few dozen Catholic men stood ready to defend their area.

And while skirmishing with hooligans in Protestant suburbs to the north, police seized components for homemade grenades, a shotgun and cartridges.

Twenty-five miles to the southwest in Lurgan, riot police intervened to prevent Protestants from walking into the Catholic side of the town, among the most bitterly polarized in Northern Ireland.

Riot police armed with shields, clubs and attack dogs pushed protesters out of one Portadown intersection. Masked teen-agers responded by pelting police with bricks and rocks, while a stolen car was left burning on the main Belfast-Dublin rail line nearby. Police in turn blasted the 300-strong crowd with water cannons, but the rioting continued.

And some extremists turned their attention to isolated Catholics. In Bangor, a mostly Protestant town east of Belfast, a Catholic church and adjoining priest's home had their windows smashed just one of scores of Catholic-occupied property targeted in the past week.

Shops in Belfast, Portadown and several smaller towns closed an hour before the protests to allow workers enough time to get away. Normally bustling shopping precincts were eerily empty by 4 p.m.

Business leaders condemned Orange tactics, saying the Protestant fraternal group was placing its own disputed right to march past hostile Catholic neighborhoods above everyone else's rights.

"Most businessmen didn't want to close their premises, and certainly do not support what the Orangemen are doing, but they had a duty to ensure that their staff could get home safely," said Bill Jeffrey, chairman of the Northern Ireland Small Businesses Federation.

Quebec

Like, it's your business? The word sovereignty did not pass the lips of Quebec Premier Lucien Bouchard during a major speech Thursday to the U.S. business community in New York.

Everett Briggs, a former U.S. ambassador to Panama and Honduras who was among the audience of 200, asked Bouchard why as the head of a separatist government he made no reference to its political agenda.

One of the reasons Bouchard gave for not mentioning the subject was that it is up to Quebecers to decide. "It is something we have to solve ourselves," he said.

Montreal

The Reichmanns at play. City hall was euphoric about the news that Toronto's Reichmann family had chosen Montreal for its $900-million, 1.8-million-square-foot indoor entertainment park.

The park, to be called Destination: Technodome, will focus on high-tech interactive entertainment and will be one of the biggest theme parks in North America.

Company officials say it will bring 7,000 permanent jobs and 35,000 temporary constructions jobs to Montreal. It is scheduled to open in 2002. The company has still to buy the land, however, from the Port of Montreal.

Nervousness mounts. Nearly 500,000 posters showing the picture of a missing 10-year-old Point St. Charles girl went up all over Montreal on Thursday. Jolene Riendeau, reported missing on Monday, has run away from home three times before. Police fear this time, however, that something might have happened to her.

According to the Missing Children's Network, about 9,000 children are reported missing in Quebec every year. Runaways account for 97 per cent; about 3 per cent are parental abductions and fewer than one per cent are criminal abductions.

Canada

The law under review. Justice Minister Anne McLellan has ordered her department to review a law that allows judges to exclude prior convictions of the accused during jury trials.

Sovereignty? It's our business

The law stems from a 1989 Supreme Court decision aimed at protecting the right to presumption of innocence. It is intended to prevent jurors from deciding guilt or innocence on the basis of past behaviour rather than on the evidence presented in court.

The use of the law to prevent jurors from learning of the previous convictions of Francis Roy caused outrage in Toronto, where Roy was on trial on first-degree murder charges in the sex slaying of an 11-year-old girl. Roy had two prior convictions for rapes of teenage girls and he had assaulted another woman only days before Alison Parrot was murdered in 1986.

Roy was found guilty in Alison's death on Tuesday and sentenced to at least 25 years in prison.

World

A contemptible court. Sporadic violence spread throughout central Kuala Lumpur this week in the wake of what was seen as the politically motivated conviction of Anwar Ibrahim, former deputy prime minister of Malaysia. "As per instructions," Ibrahim said contemptuously when he was found guilty of four counts of corruption.

Invited to address the court, Ibrahim accused Malaysian Prime Minister Mahathir Mohamad of abuses of power.

The real war and the propaganda war. Up to 70 ethnic Albanians were reported killed on Thursday in one of the worst incidents of the war in Kosovo, when two convoys of refugees on tractors and on foot were struck by military aircraft in the western part of the disputed Serbian province.

Serb authorities blamed NATO for the attack. NATO admitted striking military targets during the day in the area of Prizen and Djakovica. However, the Pentagon said Yugoslav aircraft had also been operating in the Djakovica area.

Serb leaders claimed that NATO launched the attack as part of its campaign against "all the people of Yugoslavia."

Meanwhile, United States officials said Wednesday that they believe Serb spies have penetrated NATO and are sending vital information back to Yugoslavian President Slobodan Milosevic.

Viva Espana. General Augusto Pinochet, 83, may appeal British Home Secretary Jack Straw's ruling on Wednesday that extradition proceedings can proceed against him. The former Chilean dictator is sought by Spain to stand trial on charges of crimes against humanity.

Straw said the law should be allowed to take its course and that there were no compassionate grounds on which to halt proceedings. Lady Thatcher, hitherto thought to be a stranger to compassion, nonetheless urged that General Pinochet be allowed to return home.

Back to the future. The German government started its return to its historic capital, Berlin, on Thursday as the first train bearing furniture, files, books and other supplies arrived from Bonn, the capital of Germany since 1945. The move, approved in 1991 after the fall of the Berlin Wall and German unification, is expected to cost $11 billion.

Germany's 669 legislators will inaugurate the renovated Reichstag building in central Berlin as the new seat of parliament on Monday. Regular sessions will not start until the fall.

Rich Brits. The Sunday Times came out with its 10th annual list of Britain's wealthiest.

It showed that inherited wealth is in steady decline on the list. Joining the dukes of Northumberland and Westminster among the top 1,000 are Anne Wood, the creator of Teletubbies (55 million pounds) and Paloma Picasso (350 million pounds).

Spice Girl Victoria Adams and her fiance, soccer star David Beckham, were 1 million pounds short of the 21-million pound cutoff.

Art

Sovereignty? It's our business

You can get tired of Monet. A monumental show with larger-than-life sculptures of American Indians and African tribesmen has been causing traffic jams on the Pont des Arts, a footbridge over the Seine River, in Paris this week.

Between 5,000 and 10, 000 visitors a day come to see the 68 sculptures, the work of Ousmane Sow, 63, of Senegal. The pieces, on display until May 20, are made of wire, plaster, rubber and paper-fibre, coated with a protective veneer. One of the exhibits portrays Custer's Last Stand, complete with falling horses.

Sex

The Full Monty, the calendar. Eleven women, all members of the Women's Institute in North Yorkshire, posed wearing nothing but their pearls, and strategically placed cooking implements, for a charity calendar. The women, age 45 to 60, are shown demonstrating such classic homemaker skills as jam-making, flower- arranging and baking. With an initial run of 3,500 copies, the women will donate the proceeds to the Leukemia Research Fund.

"Lots of red wine" made the photography session "good fun," said Rosalyn Fawcett, 49, who posed as Miss November. She knits.

Plot stays in bed. Pornographic cinema went mainstream in France on Wednesday with the unrestricted release of Romance X, a study of the impact of sexual liberation on a group of young authors.

Despite its literary pretensions, the film's true star is the erect penis of Italian porn actor Rocco Siffredi, according to the Guardian. Siffredi's organ has become the subject of television and radio debates, while the techniques needed to achieve erections of up to six hours' duration are explained with no more sense of outrage as if it was about gardening tips.

Maybe they'd like him in France. Darryl Strawberry, 37, the New York Yankees outfielder, was charged with possession of cocaine and soliciting a prostitute on Wednesday. Driving a gold-coloured 1999 Ford Explorer, Strawberry allegedly solicited an undercover police officer for sex for $50.

Strawberry, an eight-time all-star had been at extended spring training camp to get back into shape after colon cancer surgery last Oct. 3.

Hypocrisy

You want a Barbie doll? Nicki Lane, 20, resigned after spending only two weeks as Miss Great Britain after it came out that she was a single mother of a 6-year-old son. The beauty contest's organizers were quick to say they do not condemn single motherhood, but their rules stipulate a contestant must have no "ties," which is to say, no husband, no children.

The contest's national director in Great Britain, Nicky Price, 46, said if Miss Great Britain Universe became the overall winner she would live in Los Angeles and travel the world for a year. "We wouldn't want to be responsible for splitting up a parent from her child," he said.

Heartlessness

God may forgive them. No one else should. The Irish Republican Army has demanded that relatives of the people it abducted, murdered and secretly buried bar the media from funeral services when it returns the victims' bodies. The IRA has also said it does not want the families to conduct post-mortems to try to determine how their loved ones died.

In fact, it has gone so far as to threaten to refuse to say where victims are buried until the British and Irish governments guarantee immunity for those involved in the murders.

Warnings by federal officials that terrorists may strike again in this country have ratcheted up concerns about everything from suicide bombers to explosions in apartment buildings or at prominent landmarks. But the most frightening prospect of all is that terrorists will some day lay hands on or fabricate a nuclear weapon and explode it on American soil, causing devastation that would dwarf any terrorist act yet seen. This is a danger that demands a much more urgent response than it has thus far received.

Virtually every expert group that has analyzed the threat agrees that the surest way to prevent nuclear terrorism is to keep nuclear weapons or the materials needed to make them out of the hands of terrorists. Thus it is distressing to learn that, for all the effort in recent years to control vulnerable materials in the former Soviet Union, progress has been slow. Although strategic nuclear weapons have been consolidated in Russia and are guarded by professional security forces, the handling of smaller tactical nuclear weapons inspires less confidence. These weapons are more attractive to terrorists because of their portability. Equally troubling, enhanced security measures put in place in recent years cover only 40 percent of the potential bomb material in Russia, according to an authoritative report last week from Harvard's Project on Managing the Atom.

Meanwhile, security experts in the Bush administration are pondering the potential for placing sensors at ports and airports abroad, on ships and inside shipping containers en route, at points of entry into the United States, and along critical highways or at bridges, truck stations and toll booths. Such sensors could also help protect against so-called dirty bombs, in which a conventional explosive would be used to disperse radioactive material.

An attack with a full-fledged nuclear weapon may seem unlikely in the near future, but the penalty for failing to act now could be devastating.

The wisdom of the Northern Ireland peace agreement was shown once again last week -- but this time in the Irish Republic. With its striking gains in the election there, the Sinn Fein party has become a political force in the Republic as well as in Northern Ireland.

Sinn Fein got its start in the south, where it and the Irish Republican Army spearheaded the Irish war of independence in 1919-1921. Many of its activists opposed the new Irish government in the civil war that followed, and when the fighting ended with a victory for the government, Sinn Fein joined the IRA in estrangement from the Irish state.

What U.S. newspapers are saying

Gerry Adams and Martin McGuinness moved Sinn Fein back into the political process in Northern Ireland in the 1980s, and they ran candidates in the Irish Republic as well, finally winning a seat in the Irish Parliament, or Dail, in 1997. It wasn't until the peace agreement was signed a year later that Sinn Fein gained respectability. After the latest decommissioning of arms by the IRA, timed to influence the election, Sinn Fein more than doubled its vote and won five seats in the Dail.

Many Irish voters view Sinn Fein favorably for its struggles against the British, and many also appreciate its tough stand against illegal drugs, even though it may have veered into IRA-style intimidation. Sinn Fein supports better access to housing and health care, but with no prospect of gaining power in this election, the party has not been pressed about how it would pay for these programs.

The dominant Fianna Fail, one of the two parties that emerged from the civil war, took credit for the recent economic boom and was rewarded with a near-majority of the 166-seat Dail. Prime Minister Bertie Ahern will have no trouble forming a coalition with a smaller party. It won't be Sinn Fein, which is still too close to the IRA for comfort among Ireland's mainstream voters.

The Irish economy is losing a bit of its luster as the high-tech boom fades. Sinn Fein could become a major party in the Republic of Ireland if it figures out how to fit a moderately left-wing philosophy into Ireland's entrepreneurial society. All its efforts would come undone if the IRA resumed violence in Northern Ireland. Sinn Fein's new strength in the Republic is the best guarantor that the IRA will stay peaceful.

The confrontation between India and Pakistan over the disputed region of Kashmir has been growing more tense and ominous by the day. Given their bitter rhetoric and their history of bloodshed over the region, the showdown could easily escalate into war. Since both have nuclear weapons, it could also lead to a catastrophe dwarfing any the subcontinent has suffered before. But even if the war were contained, it would do serious damage to both parties -- and to the interests of the United States.

The two countries have been trading artillery fire over the line of control that separates them in Kashmir. India is furious about separatist violence in Kashmir, which it says is sponsored by the Pakistan government. Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf arrested thousands of suspected militants in January, but many of them have since been freed, and India says the rate of infiltration from Pakistan into the Indian portion of Kashmir is as high as ever.

That creates the first danger to the U.S. For Musharraf to reduce his troop strength in the west means hobbling the effort to stop al Qaeda and Taliban soldiers from finding refuge in Pakistan. "We could be getting a lot more help from the Pakistanis if there were not the tense situation with respect to the two countries," lamented Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld this week. If full-scale fighting erupts, Pakistan will be doing even less to help us.

Washington's improved relations with New Delhi are already suffering. Indians accuse President Bush of indulging Musharraf's cooperation with extremist groups even as he calls for a worldwide campaign against terrorism. Anti-Americanism has subsided considerably in recent years thanks to the end of the Cold War, but it could easily rebound if the U.S. is seen to be taking Pakistan's side.

The U.S., of course, has a great interest in a closer partnership with both countries. It's hard to understand the Bush administration's failure to make a high priority of preventing another war between India and Pakistan. It needs to make every effort to help -- and force -- the antagonists to step back from the brink. If they plunge over, everyone will lose.

What U.S. newspapers are saying

Washington Post

India and Pakistan have now escalated their rhetoric and war preparations to the point where it will be difficult to back down. Indian Prime Minister Atal Bihari Vajpayee told soldiers along the frontier in the disputed territory of Kashmir to prepare for a "decisive battle," and the Indian army announced a wartime streamlining of its command structure. In Pakistan, troops have been moved from the Afghan border, where they were assisting in the fight against al Qaida, to Kashmir, and government agencies were told to prepare for war. Meanwhile, Islamabad announced that it would conduct new flight tests of ballistic missiles. Neither of these nuclear states wants a full-scale war, but the risk is growing that they will nevertheless stumble into one, with catastrophic consequences. Both seem to be counting on the United States to save them from themselves -- an expectation that places a heavy burden on the Bush administration.

The escalation has been driven by several new terrorist attacks by Muslim extremists in Indian-controlled Kashmir, including the terrible butchery of 31 Indians, most of them women and children, in an army camp. India could hardly be expected not to respond to such atrocities, which have served to underline the fact that Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf has failed to fulfill his promise to crack down on the Kashmiri militant groups that use his country as a base. New Delhi's calculation appears to be that, by making clear its readiness to go to war, it will force the United States to extract concessions from Mr. Musharraf, who has positioned himself as a key U.S. ally since Sept. 11. If the tactic fails, Mr. Vajpayee apparently intends to make good on his threats by ordering commando raids or air strikes on training camps maintained by the militants inside Pakistan. It's a strategy that invites a chain of failure: that the Bush administration will not get action from Mr. Musharraf, and that a subsequent military strike intended to be limited will quickly spiral out of control.

The renewed crisis catches the Bush administration at a particularly difficult moment. The president and secretary of state are touring Europe, and have the equally volatile Israeli-Palestinian crisis and Afghanistan still to manage. Fortunately, the Indian government appears prepared to postpone any action for at least a few weeks; using that time, the administration must find a way to back India and Pakistan down while threading through the minefield of diplomatic traps laid by the two governments. The key to a solution lies in a forceful approach to Mr. Musharraf, who must be asked again to choose between alliance with the civilized world and terrorism. His government must take effective action against Kashmiri militant groups in a way that will be visible to India. Mr. Vajpayee, in turn, must persuade his military and party to accept such action as preferable to war, and stand down his forces.

When the Irish Republican Army was looking for ways to raise money in the 1980s, Nicky Kehoe was the kind of guy they turned to. His technique had nothing to do with bake sales.

He was one of the IRA men behind the still-unsolved kidnapping and presumed killing of the famous Irish racehorse Shergar, alleges Sean O'Callaghan, an IRA murderer-turned-informer who supposedly confessed all in a 1998 memoir.

But even 20 years on and with the IRA's war officially over, Mr. Kehoe is not admitting that one. "I was never charged over the horse, never even questioned by the police about the horse," he says now, his eyes narrowing. "All they've got is the word of an informer."

The Ottawa Citizen

But Mr. Kehoe hides nothing, and makes no apologies, when it comes to his role in another IRA spectacular: the day in 1982 when he was picked up outside the County Wicklow estate of Canadian billionaire Galen Weston, whose family controls the Loblaws chain. The Irish police said they had foiled a kidnapping, though Mr. Kehoe was convicted only of carrying explosives and resisting arrest. Still, he served 12 years in prison, a thumping addition to a rap sheet on which he had already racked up three years for possession of weapons as a 17-year-old in 1974.

"My past is my past and I am not going to deny it, nor condemn it, nor do I have any regrets about it," says Mr. Kehoe, who is now 46 and looking for votes, not forgiveness, as a Sinn Fein party candidate in general elections expected this May. "I was involved in something I thought was good enough to risk my life in," he adds.

Mr. Kehoe's story is not especially remarkable on an island where, on both sides of the border, on both sides of the sectarian divide, a swath of the last generation's youth have found themselves in prison for committing acts of terror. His past is only an issue now because of his future in politics, which Mr. Kehoe hopes will include taking a seat from incumbent Prime Minister Bertie Ahern in the centre of Dublin.

Long considered marginal in mainstream Irish politics as long as its IRA wing was blasting its way to influence up north, Sinn Fein has found a peace dividend of its own: rising poll numbers in Northern Ireland and now in the republic itself. Some even give the party a shot at winning a half-dozen seats this May, up from the one it holds now.

Peace dividend for Sinn Fein: With the IRA's murderous campaign officially over, Sinn Fein has emerged as a real contender in upcoming elections -- if it can sh....

Since even a small band of Sinn Fein deputies could hold the balance of power in a close election, the established mainstream parties are training their sights on this new threat.

"Yeah, nationalist parties in the republic thought we were great as long as we were only a factor up north," says Mr. Kehoe, referring to the traditional sympathy of nationalist parties in the Irish republic -- notably mighty Fianna Fail -- with Sinn Fein's aspirations for a united Ireland. "Now that we're a force down here in Dublin, they're not so warm and friendly any more."

In fact, the relationship between the nationalist parties and Sinn Fein has turned downright frosty in the pre-election run-up, and for good reason: If Sinn Fein is to win seats, it will have to take a chunk of votes from Mr. Aherne's governing Fianna Fail, which has been reeling from a series of corruption scandals.

So it is no coincidence, Sinn Fein leaders declare, that there has been an outbreak of publicity about the blood-stained resumes of some of their party's candidates. They complain in particular about attempts to link Sinn Fein candidate Martin Ferris with an IRA member recently arrested "liaising" with anti-government guerrillas in Colombia. The attempt is not so much to tar Sinn Fein with responsibility for past IRA atrocities as it is to link them to current violence: the on-going reports of IRA punishment beatings and vigilantism, and continuing questions about the IRA's ties to other terrorist movements.

"There is undoubtedly a campaign against Sinn Fein," said party president Gerry Adams in Dublin recently. "The police would be far better off tackling drug dealers than following a political agenda aimed at frightening off people from voting for Sinn Fein."

But Mr. Adams' canned outrage was tempered by the fact that Caoimhghin O'Caolain, Sinn Fein's one sitting member, created some of the trouble himself. The deputy gave a radio interview last month in which he refused to counsel people with evidence about the murder of police officers or knowledge of illegal IRA arms dumps to provide that information to police. Mr. O'Caolain said doing so would put informers at risk from others in their communities -- a dubious, even if realistic, stand for an elected official to take.

Mr. Adams spent much of last week on damage control, insisting people should trust the police and do their duty to uphold the law. But Mr. Kehoe acknowledges it is a message delivered with a wink. "I deal with the police all the time, and I would always give them information on drugs or break-ins," he says. "But I'm never going to tell them where an arms dump is."

The issue shows how slippery the legitimate political trail remains for Sinn Fein. Yet the party has strengths, too, notably its street-smart leadership, best represented by Mr. Adams, who is backed by a loyal grassroots machine.

Sinn Fein's growing acceptance, they contend, comes because it has devoted itself to fighting on local issues, from health and schools to building playgrounds. "People in here know my politics, they know what I am," says Mr. Kehoe. "Down here, politics is all about what you can deliver."

He is sitting at a table in a community centre in a working-class area of Dublin. For a year and a half now, he has been "walking the ground," as he calls it, listening to citizens' complaints, building a base of support, handshake by handshake.

Smear jobs may cost him votes in the more affluent or middle-class parts of Dublin Centre, where people read the establishment newspapers, he concedes. But among the working classes, an IRA past can even help a politician -- a touch of glamour, yes, but also a tinge of sympathy: The fight for a united Ireland was a popular one, he says.

"A lot of people on the ground see republicanism as a liberation struggle," he explains. Not all of his colleagues in the armed republican movement have made the adjustment to politics. "You get into this mindset of war and it is hard to see anything else, tough to break out of," Mr. Kehoe says. "Even for me, there are times when it is hard psychologically to do what I'm doing now."

Peace dividend for Sinn Fein: With the IRA's murderous campaign officially over, Sinn Fein has emerged as a real contender in upcoming elections -- if it can sh....

"But we're in politics to win, for real gains," he says, the politician in him recovering his balance. "We're not here just to start another 'glorious' republican campaign."

Sinn Fein

Sinn Fein's party platform from its official Web site: <http://sinnfein.ie>

- "We take our name from the Irish Gaelic expression for 'We Ourselves.' Since being founded in 1905 we have worked for the right of Irish people as a whole to attain national self-determination, and have elected representatives in every major Irish town and city.
- "Sinn Fein is an Irish Republican party. Our objective is to end British rule in Ireland. We seek national self-determination, (and) the unity and independence of Ireland as a sovereign state.
- "Sinn Fein is committed to the transformation of Irish society and to a negotiated ... settlement. We know that peace is not simply the absence of violence. Real peace, a lasting peace, is based on democracy, justice, freedom and equality.
- "Sinn Fein has a vision that sees beyond the present conflict and beyond the present phase of our history. Our vision foresees the unity of the people of this island. Our vision is for the redistribution of wealth, for the well-being of the aged, for the advancement of youth, for the liberation of women and for the protection of our children. Our vision is for a free Ireland and a free people.
- "Sinn Fein is committed to our peace strategy. We have sought with honesty and integrity to construct a peace process which reaches out and embraces everyone on the island on the basis of equality. Our objective must be for an agreement that will earn the allegiance and respect of all sections of our people.
- "To achieve these objectives, Sinn Fein is backing the Good Friday Agreement, which Sinn Fein reached with the other northern parties and the Irish and British governments following multi-party negotiations in Belfast. These negotiations arose from the Irish Peace Process, itself initiated in discussions begun several years ago.

You see, I know an awful lot of things about an awful lot of people,' says veteran entertainer Danny La Rue, 'but I wouldn't dream of cheapening myself by sharing those things. I've been approached many times to write a kiss-and-tell book, but I just don't think it's the right thing to do.' With nearly 50 years in show business, he has 'known them all', from Bette Davis and Lauren Bacall to Michael Barrymore and Eddie Izzard, and he considers everyone a friend.

He has just got back from Holt in north Wales where he helped Paul Burrell, Princess Diana's former butler, open his first flower shop. He and Burrell became friends after the butler delivered flowers to him on behalf of the Princess of Wales. La Rue is godfather to the Burrells' 16-year-old son, Alex, and he remains loyally tight-lipped about Burrell's upcoming trial for alleged theft of some of the Princess's belongings.

And while everyone else has been quick to vilify Michael Barrymore over his recent self-pitying television interview with Martin Bashir, La Rue has only sympathy for the comic. 'I know people are saying bad things about Michael, but he has suffered an awful lot. I think he should be left alone and allowed to prove himself,' he says.

'What people forget is that the pressure on him was absolutely enormous, and he used to work 48 hours at a stretch, which isn't good for anyone.' At 74, La Rue still works for more than 40 weeks of the year. He is soon to star in Snow White in Plymouth in a role written especially for him, making it his 50th pantomime, 'which must be some sort of record because no one's old enough to have starred in any more'.

But he is not simply a pantomime dame. His cabarets are legendary; he has hundreds of television appearances to his credit, including The Good Old Days, Tonight with Danny La Rue and four Royal Variety Performances. He has starred in seven West End shows, most notably as the first man to play the lead in Hello, Dolly!.

As we sit in his immaculate home in Southampton, it seems extraordinary -?both to me and to him - that he has never received an award. 'I am surprised,' he says. 'I've worked myself into the ground for charity over the years and I'm very well respected by my peers, too. I am saddened when I see some of the people who get awards and, I'll be very honest, I would like to get something in recognition for my work. A knighthood? Ooh yes, that would be lovely.

Nothing like a dame; After 50 years in show business, Danny La Rue feels it's time he was rewarded. A knighthood will do

'My sister's 80 years old now and it would be lovely to take her to Buckingham Palace to meet the Queen. But still,' he adds quickly, like the trouper he is, 'the greatest award I've had has been the respect of the British public over the years.' La Rue looks wonderful for his age. His white bouffant is immaculately arranged, his face relatively unlined and only the merest hint of eyeliner adorns his features. 'My lovely Irish mother used to say, "Whatever you do in your life comes out on your face", so I think I must have been all right. I don't think I've ever knowingly hurt anyone.' He namedrops like a man possessed, talking about Shirley, Ken and Barbara as if you should know that he is referring to Bassey, Dodd and Windsor. Photographs of some of his celebrity friends are scattered throughout his gorgeously overflowing house.

La Rue lives alone. 'But I never ever feel lonely. I work all the time and I'm constantly surrounded by people. I've got my lovely dog Jonty, who's already gone to my housekeeper with blankets and things because I'm on holiday tomorrow.' The house doesn't feel like a lonely place to be - it is crammed full of paintings, statues and antiques collected by La Rue and Jack Hanson, his manager and partner, who died from a massive brain haemorrhage in 1984. 'Jack was the great love of my life and we were together for 32 years,' says La Rue. 'We bought all these things together.

'He died in my arms when we were on a tour in New Zealand, and it was the most terrible moment of my life. I brought his body back home and when his friends came to pay their respects, we couldn't get everyone in.

'I said to Jack: "You've got a good turnout then." I've got this lovely way of talking to him all the time. Naturally, I miss him, but not like I used to.

'Straight after he died, I went through a very bad time. I came back to London to work in the West End, and I got drunk every night for about a year.

I then had a dream where I saw Jack sitting on the end of the bed, asking me what I thought I was doing to myself. I stopped drinking after that.' Since Jack's death, there has been no one special in Danny's life. 'I've been celibate and the theatre and religion are now my life.' La Rue's Roman Catholicism is vital to him and religious statues are dotted about his home.

His religion was, he says, his 'mainstay' when, some 20 years ago, he was charmed by two con men into a crooked property deal that cost him GBP 2 million.

'I lost a fortune,' says La Rue, 'but it didn't make me angry because I didn't even know how much money I had. I knew I could afford anything I wanted, but I was conned, simple as that. It made me a lot more sensible. I just picked myself up and got on with it.' La Rue credits his strength of spirit to his mother, Mary Ann Carroll, who brought up her four children on her meagre income as a seamstress. 'My mother and I were very close. I would love to have said we were very poor and starved, but there was always food on the table. Money was tight, though, and whenever I went out, I used to put newspaper around my shoes to stop them from getting dirty.' La Rue's father, Tom, died when he was 18 months old. He had been a soldier in the Irish Republican Army - 'which wasn't quite the same thing as the IRA now'. He was 'one of the lads locked up in jail. He got consumption and died very young, but I have no hatred about that. Then we came to England and it was like the English put a protective umbrella around us. I hate the mayhem and murder that is going on in Northern Ireland.' It was in the Navy as a teenager that La Rue honed his skills as a performer. After being demobbed, he was spotted in an amateur drag show and signed to appear in a West End cabaret. He changed his surname from Carroll to La Rue, and that, effectively, was that.

'You don't choose to dress up as a tart for a living,' says La Rue matter-of-factly, 'so I think my career has been all about destiny. I've had no training, but I've built up my career gradually, from being in the chorus to saying a few lines, to having a few walk-on parts. I was always a bit different from other female impersonators in that I wasn't draggy and that my women were always believable.

'I'm namedropping now,' he giggles, 'but Noil Coward once said to me: "Don't ever try and define your success because once you do, you'll lose it."

Nothing like a dame; After 50 years in show business, Danny La Rue feels it's time he was rewarded. A knighthood will do

I've been in the business five decades and I still can't cope with the amount of offers I get for work.' He is largely treated with the respect such a successful old-timer deserves. And, as his current pantomime has shown, if La Rue doesn't fit the role, the role will be made to fit him. 'I was a bit surprised when they asked me to be in the panto, because the only part I could think of was the nanny, and I could never have played the nanny because my audience would never allow me to play someone ugly. But then they wrote me the part for the Queen's sister, Danniella, which was lovely.' It hasn't all been so lovely, however, and only recently, he had a run-in with some pantomime organisers in Woking who did not give his appearance the fanfare it deserved.

'In my contract it says that I'm second top and should have the number two dressing room, but when I saw the billing, my name was very small indeed, and much smaller than people who have much less experience than I do. Of course, I had to complain to the management and ask them to change the posters. They weren't very pleased because I think it cost them GBP 30,000. But what could I do? I wasn't going to be frightened off and,' he shrugs, 'I am a pure professional, after all.' And no one could argue with that.

Danny La Rue will appear in 'Snow White and the Seven Dwarfs' at the Theatre Royal, Plymouth from December 7 to January 19. Box office: 01752 267 222.

Suicide Bombing in Israel And Clashes in West Bank

Despite a cease-fire, the violence between Palestinians and Israelis barely paused. The first suicide bomber to strike in Israel during the current cease-fire killed himself and one Israeli at a kibbutz in northern Israel. In the West Bank city of Hebron, a Palestinian was shot dead and three were injured. Israeli troops attacked two neighborhoods there on Friday in an effort to stop sniper attacks. Israeli troops continued to hold their positions in areas of Hebron that by previous agreement are Palestinian-controlled. A6

New Detail on Russian Crash

A tape recording on the ground registered a scream from a crew member aboard a Russian passenger plane at the moment that it exploded over the Black Sea last week, a Russian official said. Russian investigators are continuing to sift through wreckage of the SibirAir TU-154 jet recovered from the Black Sea to try to learn why the airliner exploded and plunged into the sea 87 miles off Russia's coast. Investigators reported finding several foreign objects in the wreckage, which supports the contention of American military officials that the plane was downed by an Ukrainian missile gone awry when it was fired during a military exercise. ##### Teams to Raise Submarine

Nearly 14 months after its 118 crewmen perished when unexplained explosions sent it plummeting to the floor of the Barents Sea, salvage teams have begun efforts to raise the Kursk. The operation to lift the 505-foot, 17,000-ton submarine, which had twin nuclear reactors and a payload of torpedoes and 22 cruise missiles, is one of the most complex salvage operations ever attempted. President Islam Karimov granted permission yesterday for U.S. warplanes and troops to use an Uzbek air base to support President Bush's campaign to root out terrorists in neighboring Afghanistan. The Army dispatched 1,000 infantry soldiers skilled at search-and-rescue, humanitarian missions and helicopter assaults.

The deal struck by Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld gave the Pentagon a foothold it needs inside Uzbekistan, a former Soviet republic on Afghanistan's northern border. But it was not clear from Karimov's comments whether it provided the wide latitude U.S. officials had sought for putting a military squeeze on Afghanistan's Taliban.

"We have offered one airfield in Uzbekistan, with all the surrounding facilities, in order to deploy a limited number of [U.S. ] transport airplanes and helicopters," Karimov said through an interpreter at a news conference with Rumsfeld.

Karimov quickly added, "In Uzbekistan we are against the use of our territory for land operations against Afghanistan and we are against air strikes from the territory of Uzbekistan. I envisage that the equipment will be used for humanitarian operations and for search-and-rescue operations."

British Prime Minister Tony Blair also was in the region yesterday, traveling to Islamabad and reaching an apparent agreement with Pakistan's president on the need to form a "broad-based" post-Taliban government in Afghanistan.

In Washington, President Bush announced a new effort to revitalize the U.S. economy, and continued efforts to mobilize the world against terrorism following the Sept. 11 attacks on America. And U.S. officials said there was new evidence linking the attacks to Saudi exile Osama bin Laden and his al-Qaeda network.

Rumsfeld's three-hour stop in Tashkent was the fourth on a five-nation tour that began Wednesday in Saudi Arabia and Oman, two countries where thousands of U.S. forces are stationed. He also held talks in Cairo with Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak on Thursday and flew to Ankara, Turkey, late yesterday.

U.S. Troops Sent to Uzbekistan ; Former Soviet state allows use of one base

In Tashkent, Karimov said Uzbekistan was seeking security guarantees in exchange for its cooperation. He said a legal document being prepared will spell out each side's commitments.

But, he said, no U.S. special operations forces - such as Army Rangers or Green Berets who specialize in operating behind enemy lines - would be allowed to operate from Uzbek territory.

"We are not quite ready for this," he said when asked why no special forces could use the base.

Hours before Karimov announced the deal, about 1,000 troops from the Army's 10th Mountain Division, based at Fort Drum, N.Y., flew across the Atlantic en route to Uzbekistan, according to a senior defense official traveling with Rumsfeld. The official spoke on condition of anonymity and said no details about the exact locations of the troops or their missions would be made public.

The 10th Mountain Division is the first regular U.S. ground troop force acknowledged by the Pentagon to have deployed to Central Asia.

Earlier, other defense officials had said light infantry from the 10th Mountain would be used in Uzbekistan to provide ground security for U.S. Air Force fighter and combat search-and-rescue teams.

The troops also would be on standby to come to the aid of any U.S. special operations troops that might encounter major trouble while conducting raids inside Afghanistan.

Karimov said his talks with Rumsfeld, which he called negotiations, produced four main points of agreement: U.S. military aircraft can use Uzbek airspace; Uzbekistan is prepared to "upgrade" its intelligence exchanges with the United States; U.S. transport planes and helicopters and personnel involved in search-and-rescue operations can use one Uzbek airfield; the legal document spelling out the deal will be made public.

Meanwhile, it appeared late yesterday that Blair had gained Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf's support for a democratic post-Taliban government in Afghanistan.

He suggested that any future regime in Kabul should include representation from all the country's ethnic groups, in addition to the dominant Pashtuns.

"I would say with satisfaction we understand each other's concerns on the happenings in Afghanistan and likely future events in Afghanistan," said Musharraf, an army general who wore a crisp, blue civilian suit for his meeting with Blair.

A Pakistani military official who asked not to be named said that a delegation of senior Taliban leaders had arrived in Pakistan in an attempt to meet with Blair and offer a solution to the stalemate over bin Laden.

Blair rejected a meeting outright, the military official said.

The United States and the United Nations have demanded that the Taliban hand over bin Laden and his cohorts for their alleged roles in the Sept. 11 attacks that left nearly 6,000 dead in three states. Bin Laden has been sheltered by the Taliban regime since 1996.

In Washington, President Bush met with Eduard Shevardnadze, president of the former Soviet Republic of Georgia. Shevardnadze said after his meeting with the President that the two "pledged to one another true cooperation, true solidarity" in the fight against terrorism.

Also, the White House said that, in a pair of telephone calls, Bush secured antiterrorism cooperation from Ethiopia and Kenya.

Bush told Kenyan President Daniel arap Moi that he was dispatching his special envoy for peace in Sudan, former Sen. John C. Danforth, to Kenya for further talks on counterterrorism.

U.S. Troops Sent to Uzbekistan ; Former Soviet state allows use of one base

Also in Washington, Secretary of State Colin L. Powell extended sanctions on bin Laden's al-Qaeda group and 24 other foreign organizations listed as terrorist, most of them Islamic. The designation means it is illegal for Americans to provide material support and U.S. financial institutions must block their assets.

Powell had to take action or the sanctions would have lapsed on Monday.

"Every one of these groups has continued to engage in terrorist activity over the past two years," Powell said.

He said bin Laden and al-Qaeda received support from the Egyptian al-Jihad and Gama'a al-Islamiyya, also an Egyptian group.

To those groups, State Department spokesman Richard Boucher added the Algerian Armed Islamic Group, the Harkat ul-Mujahdeen (Kashmiri), the Islamic Movement of Uzbekistan and the Abu Sayyaf group (Filipino).

The law requires that the terrorist group list be updated at two-year intervals. Since the October 1999 update, three groups have been added: the Islamic Movement of Uzbekistan; the Real IRA, an offshoot of the Irish Republican Army; and the AUC, a rightist paramilitary organization in Colombia.

Powell dropped the Japanese Red Army and Tupac Amaru Revolutionary Movement (Peru) from the list because he determined that the statutory criteria had not been met. Two groups, Kahane Chai and Kach, both Jewish, were combined into one.

The additions and subtractions bring to 28 the list of foreign terrorist organizations subject to sanctions.

In other developments yesterday:

U.S. officials said authorities have gathered evidence that suspected hijacking ring leader Mohamed Atta trained in Afghanistan with some of his fellow hijackers at camps run by bin Laden's inner circle. Law enforcement and intelligence officials said the investigation into the Sept. 11 plot is focusing on a small number of bin Laden lieutenants that include Ayman al-Zawahri, Mohamed Atef and Abu Zubaydah. The international police organization Interpol has issued an arrest warrant for al-Zawahri, identified as bin Laden's most trusted deputy and head of the al-Jihad terrorist group in Egypt that merged in 1998 with bin Laden's al-Qaeda network.

Transportation Secretary Norman Y. Mineta ordered airlines to strengthen their cockpit doors within 30 days. Several already have been doing so since the attacks.

An unsealed FBI affidavit revealed a flight attendant aboard American Airlines Flight 11, hijacked in Boston, used a cell phone to contact an airline employee at Boston's Logan International Airport. She said several men of Middle Eastern descent in the area of rows 9 and 10 were armed with knives and had wounded other passengers and were hijacking the plane.

According to the affidavit, also found in the bag were a copy of the Koran and a handwritten document in Arabic titled, "In the name of God all mighty, Death Certificate." The document - different from a terrorist manifesto that the FBI found on some of the hijackers and released last week - lays out instructions for Atta's burial and possessions "when I die." Authorities said the document details Atta's instructions to be buried "next to good Muslims," with his corpse pointed east toward Mecca, that strict Muslim traditions be followed for his burial, and that no women be allowed at his funeral.

The document is dated April 11, 1996, suggesting that Atta may have been considering a suicide attack for several years before he actually carried it out.

According to the Washington Post, sources in the Czech government said yesterday that Atta met an Iraqi intelligence officer in Prague just before flying to the United States in June 2000. The Iraqi has been identified as Ahmed Khalil Ibrahim Samir Al-Ani, former consul at the Iraqi Embassy in Prague. He was expelled from the Czech Republic in April for what its Foreign Ministry described as activities "incompatible with his diplomatic status," a euphemism for espionage.

Shock horror! A teenage boy finds leggy blonds attractive! He has been known to smoke the odd cigarette or two! He suffers from hangovers after boisterous parties! He loves cars and wants a motorcycle! He hasn't decided what he wants to do when he grows up!

The parents of most 19-year-old boys would be breathing a sigh of relief -- "Phew, is that all?" But when the 19-year-old boy is second in line to the British throne, even the most commonplace of pleasures becomes whipped up into a frenzy of tabloid headlines.

In recent weeks, Britain's Prince William has found his life the subject of intense media speculation once more with the publication of a much-disputed book, Diana's Boys: William and Harry and the Mother They Loved.

Among other things, the book portrays the young prince as a "one-man wrecking crew" among the girls. "Is Playboy Prince a Sex Machine?" screamed the tabloids, recalling for some early stories about his uncle Prince Andrew and - - difficult as it may be to believe now -- his own father.

The Ottawa Citizen

Even the news that Diana's butler had been arrested for theft, and that Queen Elizabeth is reported to be warming to the idea of a marriage between Prince Charles and his sweetheart, Camilla Parker Bowles, couldn't compete with new and juicy gossip about William and his brother, Harry, 16.

Author Christopher Andersen names William's closest girlfriends as glamorous English aristocrats Davina Duckworth-Chad and Emilia "Milly" d'Erlanger, and claims the prince has at the same time been enjoying a "steamy" e-mail correspondence with model and presidential niece Lauren Bush. (She denied this to The Washington Post in May.) Andersen claims there was plenty of "bed-hopping" in William's year off before college, when he visited Chile on behalf of the charity Raleigh International.

Spokesmen for the royal family reacted quickly, dismissing the claims as "utterly contemptible" and "ludicrous allegations." Andersen himself says the newspapers have blown it all out of proportion, and says he sees his book as a "tribute" to the boys and their mother.

Will Wales steps into the spotlight

So, fact or fantasy? The one thing we can be sure about is that since his mother's death four years ago, His Royal Highness Prince William Arthur Philip Louis -- or "Will Wales," as he has chosen to be known until he completes his education -- has tried to tell us as little as possible about his life.

The British media have abided by a gentleman's agreement to stay away from William and Harry while they finish their schooling. But now that William has started undergraduate studies at the University of St Andrews in Scotland, that protection may dissipate.

Andersen's book, published in New York by William Morrow, isn't for sale in the United Kingdom, but quotes from it -- and the palace reaction -- have been published by media in Britain and elsewhere.

"There is an enormous fascination with William and Harry in America," said royal historian and biographer Robert Lacey. "It's thought of as on a parallel with John F. Kennedy Jr., but in fact it's even more than that. It's as if Marilyn Monroe had had children."

Interest in the young man whom unauthorized royal biographer Kitty Kelley has dubbed "half movie star, half rock star and ... probably the saving grace of the monarchy" is currently at fever pitch. When it was announced that he was going to St Andrews, admission applications rose by 44 per cent -- 90 per cent of the increase accounted for by young women.

William and Harry, Diana once said, "are my one splendid achievement." The poignant sight of the two princes bravely walking behind their mother's coffin moved many. There were fears about what would happen to the two, who had lived most of their lives in the all-out verbal warfare that was their parents' failed marriage.

At nine, William was passing tissues under the bathroom door to soothe his sobbing mother; when Harry was nine, his father went on national television to discuss his infidelity with longtime mistress Parker Bowles. Diana was revealed as a bulimic self-harmer who had had affairs herself; Charles coldly shut himself away from his wife's grief. Royal-watchers speculated that it would be a surprise if the boys turned out even halfway normal, coming from a family that one journalist called "the maddest since the Munsters." And all that was before their mother's life was tragically cut short.

Four years later, Andersen's book and other press reports make the princes sound far more than halfway normal (with the proviso that these, like most "inside" revelations from the palace, are basically uncheckable). They are close to their father and have accepted his relationship with Parker Bowles. William and Harry are devoted to each other, even if Harry is determined to outdo his older brother on the ski slope and polo field.

Of course, there are the inevitable rumours about William's love life. Andersen claims that in Chile, more than once "William's bodyguards reportedly looked the other way while he was locked in a passionate embrace with a female volunteer." Andersen also suggests William was seen spending the night in a tent with two women, "one blond, one brunette."

Kelley, appearing on Larry King Live, summed up what many might have felt when she retorted: "Christopher, I think you'd have a worldwide exclusive if you told us that this glorious-looking young man joined a celibate Benedictine monk abbey."

Not that there haven't been more serious risks. Five high-profile aristocrats in William's circle have been caught taking drugs -- among them Tom Parker Bowles (Camilla's son) and Tara Palmer-Tomkinson (the daughter of close friends of Charles) -- but there's no suggestion William has used drugs. The worst that's been said is that he had a massive hangover after one New Year's Eve and that he apparently smokes, a habit that Andersen speculates would have enraged his mother.

Andersen also claims that in the last year William has been at the center of as many as 20 security scares involving such terrorist groups as the Real IRA, a radical offshoot of the Irish Republican Army. The severity of these threats is as yet unclear.

Will Wales steps into the spotlight

But, said Lacey -- author of Royal: The Lives of the House of Windsor, to be published next year to commemorate the queen's Golden Jubilee -- for all the tales of nightclubs and wild living, the real William is very different. A military career is by far the most realistic option, he believes.

"He's a very traditional straight kind of guy," Lacey said. "It's often forgotten that he began his gap year (between high school and college) with the Welsh Guards in Belize. He likes that sort of thing. And the army would give him the privacy he wants."

Andersen reports that William told one volunteer: "I rather like American girls. ... I can easily see myself marrying one." But most royal-watchers in Britain say he's far more likely to stick with "his own sort" -- aristocrats he's known for years -- terrified as he is that he could be set up by the press. William is said to have a real disdain for the media. Two years ago, he skipped a skiing vacation rather than face intrusion by the paparazzi.

"My own particular reading of the situation is that the queen and Prince Charles are very permissive," Lacy said, "and that the boys have responded to that by taking on the traditional aspects of the royal family, happy to take on their duties and at ease with their destiny."

Andersen calls this being "Windsorized" -- Diana's achievement being unacknowledged, much as her Spencer relatives have been cut off from the boys. "There has been an effort by the royal family to airbrush Diana out of the picture," he said. "It reminds me of the Soviets."

William's humanitarian work in Chile, however, suggests that the training for public life that Diana began has had an influence. "Diana's legacy lives on in the boys," said Andersen. "But they are also her final revenge in the war of the Windsors. They are still her boys."

Lacey said that "here in Britain we must try very hard not to place these ordinary human beings with all the weight of expectations that were placed in Charles and Diana, which they both disappointed." William and Harry "are sensitive young men, they are trying to lead private lives. And I don't think that spreading who they may be going out with ... is good for them."

Others, like Andersen, disagree, saying that media reports about the princes are necessary and inevitable: They are, after all, public figures, second and third in line to the throne.

"I think it is doing (the princes) a disservice to have this wall between the public and the boys," said Andersen. "Diana understood this; she wanted them to be like John Kennedy Jr. and embrace the media with humour, style and grace. ... William needs practice; he cannot expect to be left alone. Just as his mother was the most celebrated woman in her time, he is going to be one of the most celebrated figures of the 21st century."

Glenda Cooper writes for the Washington Post where this article first appeared.

Battle of the cliches. First, Premier Bernard Landry gave the thumbs-up sign Wednesday to Municipal Affairs Minister Louise Harel when she accused Westmount of seeking to save the "old, foul stench of colonialism." Then, on Thursday, he tried to turn the victim, Westmount, into the victimizer by accusing it of "Quebec-bashing."

Harel said she was objecting to Westmount's court challenge to her unpopular municipal merger bill, in which it has argued that Westmount is an anglophone institution and must be protected. When Westmount Mayor Peter Trent objected to the colonial remark by saying that it may "play well for a few yobs in the far regions of Quebec," Landry accused him of calling Quebecers yobs or hillbillies, saying, "It's sort of a national sport."

Westmount, once a symbol of anglophone wealth and dominance, is still one of the country's wealthiest cities. Three of five Westmount residents have English as a first language. Westmount is among several municipalities fighting against amalgamation into what by Jan. 1 will become the megacity of Montreal.

We need snow in the summer? Quebec in the Snow is one of 11 themes to be portrayed in the Saturday evening St. Jean Baptiste parade, which signals the start of two days of celebrations. For the third year in a row, the parade will take place at night, allowing for special lighting and projection effects. More than 1,000 participants will wind their way down the street, illustrating the main theme of the parade, a homage to the more than 200 festivals that take place in Quebec each year.

A terrible crime. A 16-year-old Lachute boy was found guilty Thursday of first-degree murder in the beating death of young Cuban-born Aylin Otano-Garcia last June. The boy, who cannot be named under the Young Offenders Act, will face a maximum sentence of six years in closed custody, followed by four years of close supervision.

In a case that shocked other residents of Lachute, the boy said he killed Aylin because he hated immigrants and "immigrants steal our welfare." Court testimony showed that the boy, who was 15 at the time of the crime, and a friend deliberately lured Aylin to a deserted gravel pit outside Lachute. When the friend drove off, on the pretext of getting cigarettes, the boy emerged with a baseball bat and beat Aylin to death.

Quebec 's battle of the cliches: A roundup of the events, big and small, that made news this week.

Flexibility wanted. The Parti Quebecois government has asked Quebec's court of appeal to determine whether Ottawa's new young offenders bill violates the constitution and the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child. Quebec's position is that the new bill is too harsh and runs counter to the province's tradition of social rehabilitation. Quebec Attorney-General Paul Begin said the new law does not give judges enough leeway to make a priority of the child's interests when it comes to sentencing. Ottawa's Youth Criminal Justice Act, which was reintroduced Feb. 5, has been passed by the House of Commons and is now before the Senate.

Boffo business in booze. This year, Loto-Quebec broke the $1-billion mark in revenue from its video-lottery terminals. Even though the number of video-poker machines has not increased in the past five years, the amount of money Quebec gamblers have poured into them has gone up threefold. There are 15,000 video-poker machines in Quebec, although the Quebec government recently announced it would cut that number by 1,000. It will also cut back on advertising for lotteries by 10 per cent.

Quebec's liquor monopoly also performed well the past year, selling nearly $2 billion worth of liquor in 2000-01, up 16 per cent from the previous year..

Canada

Health care needs urgent. Nurses and hospital workers across the country staged a variety of protests, complaining that they are overworked and underpaid. British Columbia passed legislation early Wednesday to outlaw overtime bans and rotating walkouts, but not all workers returned to the job.

Wednesday was the same day former Saskatchewan premier Roy Romanow began his 18-month federal inquiry into the future of Canada's health-care system. Meanwhile, the provinces have demanded an extra $4.8 billion in annual transfers, saying that pressures on the health-care system are urgent and cannot wait for Romanow.

Operation charm. Remarks made by Toronto Mayor Mel Lastman may cause irreparable damage to Toronto's Olympic bid, his critics said this week. On his way to Mombasa, Kenya to lobby African International Olympic Committee delegates, Lastman said, "What the hell do I want to go to a place like Mombasa. Snakes just scare the hell out of me. I'm sort of scared about going there, but the wife is really nervous. I just see myself in a pot of boiling water with all these natives dancing around me." In reaction, Bruce Kidd, a former Olympic athlete who heads Toronto's Olympic bid, said, "What a terrible, terrible, terrible thing to say."

History

Lying to be a hero. Joseph Ellis, the U.S. historian who won this year's Pulitzer Prize was forced to make a public apology Wednesday after it was revealed that he had embellished his personal history by inventing roles for himself in Vietnam and the civil-rights struggle. Ellis resigned from his position at Mount Holyoke, a private Massachusetts women's college. He is not expected to lose his Pulitzer Prize, awarded for a book on the U.S. founding fathers.

The apology followed an investigation by the Boston Globe into his claims to have served as a platoon leader and paratrooper with the 101st Airborne Division from 1965. In fact, the Globe found, Ellis deferred his military service in 1965 in order to study at Yale, and later spent his active service teaching at West Point military academy.

An increasing number of middle-aged American men in all walks of life have been found to have concocted a role for themselves in Vietnam, according to Glenna Whitley, co-author of Stolen Valour, a book on the syndrome. She said: "It's an odd kind of mystique. It's men of a certain age who are coming to the point in their lives where they're wondering, 'Did I do the right thing? Should I have gone?' "

Promises, promises. Less than two years after toppling Pakistan's civilian government and assuming power as chief executive, General Pervez Musharraf this week appointed himself president and head of state. Following a swearing-in ceremony in Islamabad, Musharraf said that he will return the country and its 140 million people to civilian rule after elections in October 2002, the date set by Pakistan's Supreme Court when it agreed to the military takeover of October 1999.

Quebec 's battle of the cliches: A roundup of the events, big and small, that made news this week.

An odd legal gambit. The U.S. government announced - to the surprise of even the tobacco industry - that it is seeking an out-of-court settlement with tobacco companies in its $20-billion lawsuit on behalf of sick smokers. U.S. Attorney General John Ashcroft ordered the move after reviewing the case.

Anti-tobacco campaigners immediately accused the U.S. government of rewarding its industry donors. Mark Gottlieb, lawyer with the Tobacco Control Resources Centre, said, "This decision was politically, rather than legally, motivated." The Campaign for Tobacco-Free Kids said that the tobacco industry contributed more than $8 million during the last election, with more than 80 per cent going to the Republicans.

Do they want peace? Thirty-nine police officers were hurt Thursday when they came under attack from rival Protestant and Catholic mobs in what police called the worst rioting in Belfast since 1998.

In a statement to news media in the Republic of Ireland, the Irish Republican Army accused the British government of failing to meet its own promises on police reform and military cutbacks in Northern Ireland. "Every commitment we have entered into we have honoured. On two major points in this agreement - policing and demilitarization - the British government has reneged," the IRA said.

David Trimble, the Protestant leader of the administration, dismissed the IRA's latest statement as "surreal." Trimble said if the IRA doesn't start disarming by July 1, he will resign.

Six-plus years per cookie. Kevin Weber of Santa Ana, who was convicted of stealing four cookies from a restaurant in 1995, has already served more than five years for the theft - out of a 25-year to life sentence. This week, an appeal court in California upheld the sentence for Weber, a homeless man who fell under the state's "three strike" law, under which anyone committing three felony crimes is liable to between 25 years and life in jail.

Weber's previous offences include burglary, assault with a firearm and receiving stolen goods. Critics of the law say there is no indication that it has reduced crime. The United States jails 25 per cent of all prisoners in the world although it accounts for only 5 per cent of the world's population. There are 2 million people in U.S. jails, 400,000 of them for drug offences and 70 per cent of them from racial minorities.

Kenyan women receive legal aid for rape cases

London

Hundreds of Kenyan women who say they were raped by British soldiers on exercises in their country were granted legal aid Wednesday for further investigation of their claims, their lawyer said.

The 650 women claim they were the victims of routine attacks, including gang rapes, by British troops stationed in Kenya between 1973 and last year.

Martyn Day, their British lawyer, said he has documentary evidence that British commanding officers failed to investigate reports of several of the rapes, adding the women intend to sue the Defence Ministry for negligence.

Police expose alleged Real IRA spy operation

Belfast

Police arrested five anti-British militants Wednesday on suspicion of running a dissident Irish Republican Army spying operation inside a Belfast hospital.

The Royal Victoria Hospital in the heart of Catholic west Belfast confirmed that a staff member with access to computerized patient records -- among them prominent politicians and police officers -- was among the five local people arrested.

Compiled from Star News Services

Police said the spying operation was designed to pinpoint the home addresses of potential targets for the Real IRA, a breakaway organization that opposes the IRA's 1997 ceasefire and the 1998 peace accord it inspired.

Teen shoots teacher, kills self in German high school

Coburg, Germany

A 16-year-old student armed with a pistol and a revolver opened fire in his classroom Wednesday, wounding a school psychologist and fatally shooting himself.

WORLD REPORT

Two students were slightly injured in the rush to flee the public school in this Bavarian town about 9 a.m., state police said.

The teenager walked into the classroom and fired a first shot toward the chalkboard. The round ricocheted into the ceiling, sending the teacher and her pupils fleeing, police said.

A second teacher, who serves as school psychologist, tried to enter the room to calm the student. He shot her in the thigh, said Bernhard Schmitt, a police officer at the scene.

The 16-year-old then turned the revolver on himself, police said.

British clerk who chopped up friend guilty of murder

London

A 28-year-old clerk was convicted Wednesday of murdering and dismembering a friend, whose body parts he scattered around the housing project where he lived. He was sentenced to life in prison.

A jury at Winchester Crown Court, 100 km southwest of London, convicted Richard Markham of killing carpenter Tristian Lovelock, 25, in May 2002 by hitting him in the head with a hammer 15 times.

Markham, an accounts clerk, told the jury during the trial that he had killed his drinking buddy in self-defence after Lovelock, who had a history of violence, threatened him with a First World War bayonet.

Israeli student's treatment leads to probe at Oxford

London

Oxford University is investigating a professor who rejected an Israeli student's job application because of Israel's treatment of the Palestinians.

Andrew Wilkie, the Nuffield professor of pathology at Pembroke College, could face disciplinary action if he is found to have violated the university's anti-discrimination rules while turning down the student's request to work in his college laboratory.

In an e-mail that Wilkie sent to Amit Duvshani, the geneticist said:

"I have a huge problem with the way that the Israelis take the moral high ground from their appalling treatment in the Holocaust and then inflict gross human rights abuses on the Palestinians because they (the Palestinians) wish to live in their own country.

"I am sure that you are perfectly nice at a personal level, but no way would I take on somebody who had served in the Israeli army. As you may be aware, I am not the only U.K. scientist with these views, but I'm sure you will find another suitable lab if you look around."

Three years of military service is compulsory in Israel.

Test-tube-born 'monster' condemned by scientists

Madrid

An experiment that led to the deliberate creation of a hermaphrodite human embryo was condemned as irresponsible by fertility scientists Wednesday.

The chimera -- named after the Greek monster that was part lion, part serpent and part goat -- was formed by placing cells from a newly conceived male embryo into a three-day-old female embryo. The resulting embryo was part male and part female and could potentially have developed into an apparently healthy fetus.

WORLD REPORT

The American fertility doctor behind the experiment claimed the creation of chimeras could eventually be used to treat genetic diseases.

Saudi police catch militant suspect linked to attacks

Riyadh, Saudi Arabia

Police have caught a suspected militant linked to the May suicide bombings in the capital, the official Saudi Press Agency reported Wednesday.

Zafer Abdul Rahman al-Shihri was arrested Tuesday night in an abandoned house in the southern province of al-Namas, the agency said. He was found with 50 automatic rifles, ammunition, a personal computer and fake identification papers.

He is wanted for assisting 19 suspected militants who belong to the group behind the May 12 suicide attacks on foreigners' housing compounds in Riyadh. The attacks killed 25 bystanders and triggered an extensive manhunt for Islamic militants.

Women to cast ballots -- but only in mock vote

Kuwait City

Rola Dashti felt a surge of joy when she first held a voter registration card with her name on it. But it faded quickly. The card, after all, wasn't real.

Dashti will cast her ballot Saturday when the country's next parliament is chosen, thanks to a journalists' association that has organized mock elections for women. Only men can vote in Kuwait.

There are signs, however, that Kuwait may eventually allow women to vote.

The country's emir, Sheik Jaber Al Ahmed Al Sabah, has tried to enfranchise women, liberal legislators have pushed to overturn the law and women's activists have taken their challenge to court. All those efforts have failed, mainly because of Muslim fundamentalism and tribal traditions.

Publishers launch drive against 'digital shoplifting'

Tokyo

A group of Japanese publishers has launched a campaign to stop people from using camera-equipped cellphones to photograph magazines instead of buying them.

Palm-sized handsets embedded with camera lenses the size of a thumbtack have proved overwhelmingly popular in Japan, where people use them to snap photos and relay them instantly over the Internet.

But as the technology improves to produce sharper images, more people are using them in bookstores for "digital shoplifting," said Ryosuke Katsumi, spokesman for the Japan Magazine Publishers Association.

From this week until the end of August, the association is posting notices at bookstores across the country advising customers that such usage is against the law, he said.

Mass Hong Kong protest underscores frustrations

Hong Kong

A huge protest against an anti-subversion bill highlighted deep fears among the public that Hong Kong's freedoms could be eroded and pro-democracy legislators said the government should reconsider the bill.

WORLD REPORT

"The people had one key message for Hong Kong leader Tung Chee Wah's administration: 'Listen to us,' " commentator Christine Loh said, a day after 500,000 people protested the planned national security law.

The demonstration was Hong Kong's biggest since a million people took to the streets in outrage after China used troops to crush the Tiananmen Square pro-democracy movement in 1989.

Suspected terrorist killed planting bombs in Kabul

Kabul, Afghanistan

A suspected terrorist was killed when a homemade bomb he was planting exploded by accident just east of Afghanistan's capital, police said Wednesday.

The blast occurred late Tuesday, leaving a two-metre-wide crater in a dirt road 15 km east of Kabul and scattering the unidentified man's remains through the area.

It was unclear who or what the slain man may have been targeting.

Schoolboy said killed for breaking cricket trophy

Dhaka, Bangladesh

Angry members of a school cricket squad battered a teammate to death after he accidentally smashed a newly won trophy in northern Bangladesh, news reports said Wednesday.

The teenaged victim, identified only as Rajiv, was killed after the team won the steel and wood trophy Monday in Gazipur town, 30 km north of the Bangladesh capital Dhaka, Ittefaq newspaper reported.

Rajiv was waving the trophy with one hand when he dropped it on concrete pavement near the school. The prize broke into several pieces.

Teammates turned angry and beat Rajiv with iron rods and wooden sticks, leaving him seriously injured. He died on the way to a hospital.

Police arrested seven teenaged boys for their alleged involvement in the attack, the paper said, without giving further details.

Prosecutors charge 13 in marriage fraud case

Kansas City, Kan.

U.S. federal prosecutors said Wednesday they busted a scheme to arrange sham marriages between Pakistani men and American women that paid the wives $60 US a month.

Authorities said they arrested five people and were searching for eight others named in the federal indictment.

According to the indictment, Kansas City women recruited the prospective wives and often served as witnesses for their weddings, which took place over nearly two years in the Kansas City area.

The wives then contacted immigration officials to have their husbands' statuses changed to alien relative, the indictment said.

Car passenger killed by falling landscaping block

Omaha, Neb.

A car passenger was killed when a landscaping block fell from an overpass and crashed through the windshield. Police believe the block was dropped deliberately.

WORLD REPORT

Michelle Fergus, 34, of Council Bluffs, Iowa, was in the car's passenger seat Tuesday night when she was struck in the face by the block on Interstate 680, Officer Cathy Martinec said.

The driver, her fiance, took Fergus to hospital, where she was pronounced dead.

Because of the high concrete sides to the overpass bridge, investigators don't believe the block fell off a truck passing above, Martinec said.

The block was more than half a metre square and couldn't have been lifted by a single person, police said.

Palestinian leaders have put aside reservations to parts of the U.S.-developed plan for peace with Israel and are ready to get started on it, Prime Minister Mahmoud Abbas said Sunday, heeding an appeal by Secretary of State Colin Powell.

While other Palestinian leaders accused Israel of hedging in its acceptance, Abbas spoke forcefully about continuing with the plan to gain a Palestinian state within three years on land still partly ruled by Israel. Abbas also was clear about his goals:

"We look forward to stopping, ending, totally ending settlement, ending the siege, ending the separation wall, assassinations, the collective punishments, destruction of farms and the infrastructure and restricting the movement of citizens and Palestinian institutions and to set out to free thousands of Palestinian prisoners."

For his part, Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon said, after conferring in Jerusalem with Powell, that Israel soon would meet with Palestinians, "and with the help of the Americans, we will be able to achieve a settlement that will lead to peace."

U.S. commander Franks declares the end of Saddam's Baath Party in Iraq

BAGHDAD, Iraq (AP) - The United States declared Saddam Hussein's Baath Party dead Sunday, with the war's commander telling Iraqis that the instrument of their deposed dictator's power was dissolved and promising to purge its influence from the country it dominated for 35 years.

Gen. Tommy Franks' message, delivered in Arabic by an announcer on the coalition's Information Radio, broadcast a clear message over the AM radio waves across postwar Iraq: Any activity by Baath Party holdouts who oppose U.S. occupation will not be tolerated.

"The Arab Baath Socialist Party is dissolved," Franks said, but high difficulties remain in genuinely eliminating it.

Top Shiite leader calls for withdrawal of US-led coalition forces from Iraq

AP News in Brief; Abbas says Palestinians are ready to get started on peace plan

NASIRIYAH, Iraq (AP) - The leader of Iraq's largest Shiite Muslim group denounced the U.S.-led occupation forces Sunday and demanded they pull out and allow the Iraqi people to establish their own government.

Ayatollah Mohammad Baqir al-Hakim, who returned to his homeland Saturday after spending more than two decades in exile in neighboring Iran, made the call in this predominantly Shiite city despite the presence of a squad of U.S. Marines who were protecting him.

"We don't fear these (U.S. and British) forces. This nation wants to preserve its independence and the coalition forces must leave this country," al-Hakim said. As he spoke, about 4,000 supporters chanted "Yes to Hakim" and "Hakim is our leader."

A U.S. officer said the Marines were there to protect al-Hakim, leader of the Iran-backed Supreme Council of the Islamic Revolution of Iraq.

Bush and South Korean president to discuss alliance, North Korean nuclear standoff at summit this week

NEW YORK (AP) - South Korea's leader traveled to the United States on Sunday for consultations with President Bush on the North Korean nuclear crisis, keenly aware that Pyongyang will be looking for any sign of a rift as it plots strategy on its weapons development.

Bush and South Korea's President Roh Moo-hyun are likely to reaffirm their military and economic partnership when they meet for the first time.

Roh said the summit won't yield "spectacular" results, and added: "On matters of detail, there are different points of view. But on the big matters of principle, we are in accord."

The sense of urgency about North Korea's military threat is far greater now than when Kim met Bush and spoke in favor of engaging the North. Bush said at the time he didn't trust North Korea and would suspend missile talks with it, embarrassing the South Koreans and infuriating North Korea.

Britain's top agent within IRA reportedly in hiding after identity exposed

DUBLIN, Ireland (AP) - The top British mole within the Irish Republican Army - a man code-named "Stakeknife" who played a central role inside the outlawed group for decades - has fled Ireland after being exposed, several newspapers reported Sunday.

For years, the identity of a suspected secret agent has been the subject of intense, fearful speculation within the ranks of the IRA and its allied Sinn Fein party.

Reports in Sunday newspapers in Dublin, London and Belfast identified the agent as Alfredo "Freddy" Scappaticci, the IRA's longtime director of internal security. That position would have given him ideal cover as the officer responsible for identifying, torturing and killing traitors to the paramilitary force.

Police sources and a fellow IRA mole also identified Scappaticci, a longtime confidante and west Belfast neighbor of Sinn Fein chief Gerry Adams, as Stakeknife.

Joint chiefs chairman says U.S. consolidating forces at bases in Gulf ally Qatar

DOHA, Qatar (AP) - In a new postwar consolidation of U.S. forces in the Persian Gulf, the U.S. military is pulling out of one Qatari air base and upgrading another, the top U.S. military officer said Sunday.

AP News in Brief; Abbas says Palestinians are ready to get started on peace plan

The moves reflect the suddenly changed circumstances for American forces since the demise of Saddam Hussein's government in Iraq, particularly for air forces based in Qatar and elsewhere in the Gulf. Iraq's neighbors no longer feel threatened, and there is no need to enforce no fly zones over Iraq.

Gen. Richard Myers, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said during a visit to U.S. and allied troops that the American presence at an air base called Camp Snoopy would "go away" soon.

Empty-handed, weapons hunters operating without translators or help from scientists

CAMP DOHA, Kuwait (AP) - U.S. weapons hunters - empty-handed after seven weeks of field work - are still operating without translators, have had almost no contact with Iraqi scientists and can't tell what's missing from looted sites where suspected weapons of mass destruction were thought to be hidden.

Some of the problems are logistical. Others seem to be the result of limited manpower and expertise. In interviews with The Associated Press, military planners involved in the search said they were working to solve them.

While the basic work structure will continue, they said, several elements are expected to improve now that former U.N. inspectors are joining the operation and its command is switching to the Pentagon.

Experts say the changes are desperately needed if the Bush administration is to prove Iraq had the chemical or biological weapons the White House said it went to war to destroy.

Doctors once lured to Appalachia being taken away in handcuffs over painkiller prescriptions

PIKEVILLE, Ky. (AP) - More than a dozen Appalachian doctors, many of them recruited to work in the medically underserved region, have been taken away from their patients in handcuffs for allegedly supplying drug addicts with powerful narcotics.

In eastern Kentucky alone, seven small-town doctors are in prison or on their way for illegally prescribing drugs like the painkiller OxyContin. At least six others have been arrested in the hills of West Virginia, Virginia, and southern Ohio.

Advocates for the mountain region say that while the loss of so many doctors leaves a void, in these circumstances, the departures can only improve medical care.

Federal and state law enforcement agencies began cracking down on wayward physicians in Appalachia in 2000, after OxyContin, intended for cancer patients and others suffering from severe pain, began showing up in large quantities on the black market.

Pneumonia vaccine may hold heart benefits as well

WASHINGTON (AP) - Vaccine used to prevent pneumonia may also have benefits for the heart, new research indicates.

Mice vaccinated using a bacteria that is a common cause of pneumonia developed high levels of an antibody that slows or halts the progression of heart disease, researchers working in California and Finland found.

Trials are under discussion to see if the same response occurs in larger animals, says Gregg J. Silverman of the University of California, San Diego, a co-author of the study.

AP News in Brief; Abbas says Palestinians are ready to get started on peace plan

"If we can harness this potential, we may have new ways to treat patients with heart disease, as well as the possibility of developing a vaccine for our children to prevent this disease from ever developing in their later years," Silverman said.

But the situation is far more complicated in humans than mice, said university colleague Joseph J. Witztum, a co-author of the paper.

Immunizing mice with pneumococcus leads to the generation of antibodies that the researchers believe lead to the protection from heart disease, he said. "We do not yet know if such a dominant and important response occurs in people."

British monarchy's face in Australia steps aside over rape allegations

CANBERRA, Australia (AP) - The British monarchy's face in Australia stepped aside Sunday to fight allegations he raped a woman in the 1960s when he was a preacher, saying he wanted to maintain the "integrity and dignity" of the governor general post.

Peter Hollingworth, 68, already is under severe pressure to resign because of criticism over his handling of cases of sex abuse by clergy while he was Anglican archbishop of Brisbane during the 1990s. He has admitted "errors in judgment" from the priest scandals.

Prime Minister John Howard, who hand-picked Hollingworth for his post, announced the decision Sunday. Hollingworth later released a statement saying, "I have always been mindful of maintaining the integrity and dignity of the office of the governor general of Australia."

Hollingworth is the official representative of Queen Elizabeth II in the former British colony. In his mostly ceremonial post, he signs laws passed by the Australian Parliament and presents awards, and his power comes chiefly from the moral authority of the office.

NBA star Yao Ming hosts SARS telethon

BEIJING (AP) - Chinese basketball star Yao Ming hosted a telethon to raise money for SARS research Sunday.

Yao, the 7-foot-6 center for the Houston Rockets, answered questions about his first season in the NBA and signed basketballs and other memorabilia for callers. The three-hour telethon broadcast from his hometown of Shanghai raised more than $300,000 to help researchers seeking a cure. SARS has killed at least 240 people in China, the most of any country in the world.

"I returned to my motherland, but found it struggling through a most serious trial. Now everyone needs to make their contribution to the fight against SARS," said Yao, who is immensely popular at home.

Yao had a little help from his friends. Chinese national soccer player Qi Hong and women's national soccer team captain Sun Wen made appearances, and NBA players and former stars including Shaquille O'Neal and Magic Johnson appeared in videotaped messages.

NORTHERN IRELAND: IRA promises to begin disarming

BELFAST, Northern Ireland - Uttering words it had long decried as surrender, the Irish Republican Army proclaims it will soon begin disarming, a breakthrough that makes possible a lasting peace settlement in Northern Ireland after 30 years of bloodshed. Britain and Ireland praise the move and prepare to restore power to Northern Ireland's Catholic-Protestant administration.

TRUTH IN NUMBERS: Statistics used for credibility, political edge

WASHINGTON - The presidential campaign is turning into Stats Wars as Al Gore and George W. Bush reach for the authority that only statistics seem able to provide. What if some of the numbers are skewed? That almost does not seem to matter, observes a statistical expert. Stats are a handy way to "condemn and indict in a hurry" and, best of all for the candidate, "you both get authoritativeness and no accountability" with their use.

Monuments to honoured dead recall glory days

MORE than any other historical monument, Dublin's Glasnevin Cemetery is a potent symbol of Ireland's glorious but often troubled past.

The remains of some 1,500,000 Irish citizens rest in its confines, making it the largest cemetery in Ireland and one of the biggest in Europe.

Dubbed 'The City Of The Dead', Glasnevin has many secrets hidden behind the walls which guard the final resting place of Ireland's many fallen heroes.

As you walk through the large iron gates you are walking into Ireland's history.

The volunteers who were hanged in Mountjoy Prison during the War Of Independence now have pride of place at the front of the cemetery after being re-buried last year in an emotive ceremony attended by Taoiseach Bertie Ahern.

Patriot

Patriot Kevin Barry, the young Cork-born volunteer who faced certain death as he rose up with his valiant compatriots in the 1916 Easter Rising, also lies at rest just inside the gates.

The plots in which these men lie are neither Republican, Fine Gael nor Fianna Fail but a 'neutral' area.

This is to signify that, officially at least, old internecine demons have also been put to rest.

Glasnevin has its origins in the period of the anti-Catholic Penal Laws when the faithful were forbidden, among other things, their own cemeteries.

They regained the right to bury their dead in Dublin as Glasnevin opened its gates in 1832. Its establishment had been a crusade for 'The Liberator', Daniel O'Connell, who fought for Catholic emancipation. In the decades before the 1830s, Catholics were buried in Protestant graveyards as priests said shortened Requiem Masses outside the cemetery wall - because they were banned from Protestant ground.

The original cemetery - established as a place where Catholic, Protestant and dissenter could be buried alongside each other for the first time - comprised nine acres.

RESTING PLACE OF IRISH HEROES

Prior to clearance and landscaping, the land was consecrated as Prospect Cemetery by Monsignor Yore in September 1831.

Its first incumbent, Michael Carey from Francis Street, Dublin, was buried in February 1832.

Glasnevin Cemetery has since grown to cover 120 acres.

Daniel O'Connell's grave stands as a fitting monument to his achievements and his vision for a better Ireland.

His family members are buried with him in his crypt while a symbolic round tower watches over this patriot's final resting place. Unfortunately, the tower is now closed off to the public since a bomb blast - blamed on loyalist paramilitaries - ripped the wooden staircase away in the 1970s.

In O'Connell's day the biggest threat to the cemetery came from grave robbers. In the dead of the night they would steal the corpses for use on the dissecting tables of Dublin's medical colleges.

The problem became so grave that in 1837 giant walls were built around the cemetery and more than 20 armed watchmen were hired.

Tragic

Some of the watchmen were murdered by the marauding grave robbers and became the protected rather than the protectors.

One of the more tragic aspects of Glasnevin relates to the Famine years when more than 300,000 people were packed together in a one-acre pauper grave site.

Bodies were piled into mass graves in horrific numbers as the Famine raged throughout the land. In their weakened condition even the common cold could claim the lives of the impoverished.

Glasnevin is also the final resting place of the 'Uncrowned King of Ireland,' Protestant Charles Stewart Parnell, who features in the Top 10 of our reader poll to find the nation's greatest hero or heroine (Pages 26 & 27). He rests beside the unmarked graves of Ireland's forgotten dead.

His work and achievements are not celebrated, or even hinted at, on his gravestone. A large granite boulder, taken from the Avondale family home in Co Wicklow, is simply incised 'Parnell'.

He is buried in the cholera mound alongside his mother Delia.

Considering he did not die from the dreaded disease that touched the lives of thousands during the 19th century, one may wonder why such a celebrated leader would choose such an anonymous grave.

One theory is that he had a fear of body snatchers. A more probable reason was his wish to be near his people. His funeral in 1891 was the biggest witnessed in the graveyard's long history as 130,000 mourners packed in to pay their last respects to the great orator who had spent years fighting for Irish home rule.

As the patriot's coffin was being lowered into the grave, a shooting star streaked across the sky. Many believed that this was his soul being set free.

Whatever the truth, it was certainly symbolic of the man who had lit the spark of Irish self-determination.

The tombs of these leaders are in stark contrast to the seemingly hidden grave, with its nondescript headstone, of controversial statesman Eamon de Valera - another figure in our Top 10 Irish heroes' list.

The former 1916 rebel and civil war leader's grave has become the target of vandals who have scrawled messages of hate.

RESTING PLACE OF IRISH HEROES

It is the cemetery's most defaced and, many would say, neglected grave. A sad reflection on the career of this veteran of the 1916 Easter Rising, War of Independence and Civil War.

He went on to found Ireland's biggest political party, Fianna Fail, and was Taoiseach on three occasions and president twice - the only person ever to hold both posts.

By contrast the grave of legendary Michael Collins, hero of the War of Independence, has become a shrine.

Mourners

Initially buried in Cork city after his assassination in west Cork in 1922, his body was eventually moved to its final resting place.

Some 105,000 mourners were at the Glasnevin funeral service - the biggest of any there since Parnell was laid to rest.

His grave is regularly decorated with mementoes and flowers from admirers from all over the world.

People facing operations or other traumas visit the grave of the 'Big Fella' to seek solace and, perhaps, his intercession with an even bigger fella on their behalf. While the Irish News of the World team were there we saw an admirer leaving an expensive-looking bronze bust of the former IRA leader.

It reflects the public's appreciation of the enormity of Collins' contribution in helping to free Ireland. He is undoubtedly the most loved denizen of the hallowed grounds.

Nearby is a memorial to Irish soldiers who have died in all wars including both world wars. A sentiment to which the former Commandant-in-Chief of the Irish Free State Army would have subscribed.

The love of his life, Kitty Kiernan, who was devastated by his untimely death, is buried six graves away. She died some 20 years after his demise.

Virtually every other politician of the 19th and 20th centuries who has influenced Ireland's struggle is buried in Glasnevin.

As, indeed, are those who had a great impact on the nation's social history. Ireland's most famous trade unionist, Liverpool-born 'Big' Jim Larkin, who established the Irish Transport and General Workers' Union, is here.

Colourful character Brendan Behan, playwright and former IRA rebel, insisted that he was buried with a guard of honour of Dublin bin men.

Behan is among a litany of Irish literary figures buried in Glasnevin.

Women

Among the many famous women buried in the cemetery are Maude Gonne MacBride, Countess Constance Markievicz and Ann Devlin.

Maude Gonne became the doyen of radical feminism and republicanism. She founded revolutionary group, the Daughters of Erin and published The Irish Woman journal.

With playwright/poet William Butler Yeats, who was in love with her, she helped to establish Dublin's Abbey Theatre.

She became Yeats' muse but, despite his proposals did not marry him. Instead she wed dashing Irish Brigade Major John MacBride and, along with him, became involved with labour leader James Larkin, Edinburgh-born Citizen's Army leader James Connolly and many leading women activists, in radical politics.

RESTING PLACE OF IRISH HEROES

Maude's husband was executed for his part in the Easter Rising. Arrested for her republican activities in 1923, she became one of 91 women hunger strikers.

She wrote a fascinating memoir, A Servant Of The Queen. She was buried in Glasnevin's Republican Plot in 1953.

Maude's son, Sean MacBride, also became involved in politics and in 1936 was appointed Chief of Staff of the Irish Republican Army.

The gun-toting, uniformed Countess Constance Markievicz was another key radical republican and comrade of Maude Gonne who became the first woman MP in Britain. She did not take her seat in Parliament because of her Sinn Fein objections to the oath of allegiance to the British Crown.

Ann Devlin was involved and imprisoned with Robert Emmet for her part in the 1798 Rebellion.

In paying tribute to her, Easter Rising leader Padraig Pearse said: "Whenever the name of Robert Emmet is mentioned, let the name of Ann Devlin never be forgotten."

Glasnevin cemetery is also, possibly, the only graveyard in the world with its own pub!

The Grave Diggers' Bar backs on to the cemetery wall and has become part of the folklore of the place.

A hatch in a hole in the wall enabled grave diggers, watchmen and the occasional soldier, who were not allowed to frequent pubs in uniform, to indulge in their favourite tippie.

The authorities tried to close the pub after funerals sometimes went awry. A few too many drinks were being consumed, incapacitating grave diggers and funeralgoers.

The Grave Diggers' Bar still has a hole-in-the-wall serving hatch - but this one is inside amid the cosy snugs.

Packed

The cemetery is now getting full and, in a few years, it may close its gates to burials.

But there is one thing for sure - when the Day of Judgment finally comes and they all arise from the dead, as they were in life, it will be an amazing place to be!

And, undoubtedly the nearby Grave Diggers' Pub will be packed to the rafters.

The Glasnevin Cemetery tour runs every Wednesday and Friday afternoon. Group tours begin at 2.30pm, but private guided tours can be arranged. For further information call (01) 830 1133.

British public just says no to 'Queen Camilla' in poll

London

The British people would be happy for Prince Charles to continue his relationship with Camilla Parker Bowles after he became king -- provided she were not given the title of queen, according to an opinion poll.

The NOP poll for the BBC's Panorama program suggests that the prince has two ways of becoming king and retaining public backing: He can either continue to cohabit with Parker Bowles after acceding to the throne or he can marry her and give her an alternative title to that of queen.

The NOP reveals that there is continuing public resistance to the idea of Parker Bowles becoming queen. It says that 52 per cent of people oppose Parker Bowles gaining the title in the event of the couple marrying and Prince Charles acceding to the throne.

Only 30 per cent support the move, while 18 per cent do not know.

Riviera palace razed over planning rules violations

Paris

Bulldozers began tearing down a $32-million Cdn luxury mansion on the Cote d'Azur last week after its owner was found to have committed the biggest breach of planning regulations ever recorded in France.

The action followed 12 years of legal battles in which the former owner, Christian Pellerin, a prominent French property tycoon, was jailed for blatantly flouting planning rules.

Demolition teams started ripping apart the glass, metal and concrete extravaganza -- complete with Roman-style marble saunas, fountains, a private cinema, tennis courts and even a nuclear bomb shelter -- with spectacular views of the Mediterranean that Pellerin had built at Cap d'Antibes.

Putin may cancel trip to Denmark over Chechens
Copenhagen

Russian President Vladimir Putin has threatened to cancel a state visit to Denmark because of a Chechen congress to be held there next week, Denmark's foreign minister said Saturday.

The conference of Chechen separatists and their Danish supporters, scheduled today in the Danish capital Copenhagen, is seen "very negatively" in Russia because of the bloody hostage crisis with Chechen rebels that ended Saturday morning, Foreign Minister Per Stig Moeller said.

Putin was scheduled to meet with Danish leaders and Queen Margrethe on Nov. 12, a day after attending a summit with European Union leaders in Copenhagen. Denmark holds the EU's rotating presidency through December.

Adams dismisses demand for IRA to disband itself
Dublin

The Irish Republican Army will not cease activities in response to British and Protestant demands, Sinn Fein leader Gerry Adams declared Saturday in a detailed rebuttal to calls for the IRA's abolition.

Adams held out hope that the outlawed group might eventually go out of business -- if Britain and leaders of Northern Ireland's dwindling Protestant majority gave Sinn Fein key political concessions in return.

"Do I envisage a future without the IRA? The answer is obvious. The answer is yes," Adams told an audience of Sinn Fein and IRA members in a rural Republic of Ireland hotel.

Britain stripped powers Oct. 14 from the province's Catholic-Protestant administration after the major Protestant party, the Ulster Unionists, threatened to resign.

The British move kept the coalition, formed under terms of the Good Friday peace pact of 1998, intact for potential revival.

At least 21 die as gales
lash Britain and Europe
London

Powerful winds lashed Britain and northwestern Europe as a storm swept through the region Sunday, killing at least 21 people and causing major travel disruptions.

Falling trees killed six people in Britain, where winds gusted above 150 km/h. Two died in the Netherlands and two others were blown into the North Sea and believed drowned.

The winds fatally slammed a 13-year-old rollerskater into a truck in Belgium and a man repairing a roof died when he fell off his ladder.

The gales uprooted trees, ripped off roofs and played havoc with rail, air, sea and road travel.

Britain's Meteorological Office said severe gales of up to 130 km/h lashed England and Wales. A gust of 154.6 km/h was recorded at Mumbles in south Wales.

arrested after stabbing

Tokyo

An opposition lawmaker known as an anti-corruption crusader was stabbed to death in front of his Tokyo home Friday and Japanese media reported that police had detained the leader of a right-wing extremist group for the attack.

The 48-year-old man, who was not identified, surrendered to police and confessed after fleeing the scene of the slaying, public broadcaster NHK television quoted police as saying early Saturday. Police were expected to request a warrant for his arrest, the report said.

The lawmaker, Koki Ishii, was stabbed in the stomach Friday morning as he was getting into a car on a quiet residential street. He was rushed to a hospital but died about an hour later, said Shoji Toyohara, a spokesman for the Democratic party.

Police say 22 killed in attack by separatists

Gauhati, India

Suspected separatist guerrillas knocked at the homes of villagers in India's remote northeast just after midnight, asked the men to come out and then killed 22 of them, survivors and police said Sunday.

Another 12 were wounded in the attack on Dadgiri, a village in Assam state close to India's border with Bhutan, said P.K. Bhuyan, a local police officer.

The attackers told the female villagers that the men would return in the morning. Instead, they lined them up and fired, police quoted Babulal Yadav, a villager who survived the attack, as saying.

Twenty people were killed instantly in the attack. Two others died on the way to hospitals in Kokrajhar, about 250 km, west of Gauhati, the state capital, police said.

China's 'pro-Western' music chief in custody

Beijing

The flamboyant director of China's national symphony orchestra has been placed under house arrest on the orders of Communist Party cultural commissars.

They claim that his efforts to revitalize classical music were biased in favour of "Western compositions."

In eight years at the helm of Beijing's premier concert hall, Qian Cheng, 40, had attracted a new generation of music lovers by demanding adventurous interpretations and vibrant performances from the national symphony orchestra.

However, his determination to showcase European works, at the expense of Chinese classical pieces, led to a rift with Yu Songlin, the orchestra's chairman and a veteran of the cultural bureaucracy.

Japan fails to return five seized by North Korea

Tokyo

WORLD REPORT

Five Japanese citizens who returned to visit their homeland after a quarter of a century of captivity in North Korea had their visit "extended" by the Tokyo government Sunday.

The group, who returned to Japan a fortnight ago, were originally due to go back to Stalinist North Korea today. But the return was put off after their families urged Tokyo not to send them back.

It was unclear whether the group were consulted before the decision was made.

But it has created a dilemma for the five, who were kidnapped from coastal spots in Japan in 1978 to teach Japanese to be North Korean spies.

Although they were brought up in Japan and have been visibly overwhelmed by the welcome from friends and families, all have lived most of their adult lives in North Korea. Some reports suggested they had been brainwashed by the Pyongyang regime.

Brazilian leftist leading in presidential voting

Sao Paulo, Brazil

Former union boss Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva took a commanding lead in Brazil's presidential election Sunday, early official results showed, signalling a victory that would mark a historic shift to the left for Latin America's largest country.

Silva, of the leftist Workers Party, had 58 per cent of the vote with nearly 28 per cent of the ballots counted, the federal electoral court said.

Jose Serra, the government candidate, had 42 per cent.

New York is going bust, hard-hit city's mayor says

New York

The spectre of the civic chaos that enveloped New York in the 1970s looms again with reports from City Hall of a deficit of up to $6 billion US in next year's $42-billion budget.

Mayor Michael Bloomberg is warning of draconian cuts in services ranging from the police to emergency medical treatment for the poor, combined with steep rises in everything from income tax to parking fines.

As much as half the damage to the budget has been blamed on the terrorist attacks that destroyed the World Trade Centre. About $3 billion was lost in direct tax revenues because there were no Twin Towers left to tax, while the loss of 146,000 jobs in the attacks also starved the city coffers of tax on $17 billion a year in wages.

New drug from Thailand

seeping into raver life

Sacramento, Calif.

The newest drug to hit California's underground club scene is sweet, colourful -- and deadly.

The drug, a form of methamphetamine called ya ba, a Thai name meaning "crazy drug," has made its way into raves and is said to be significantly more powerful and dangerous than the current club drug of choice, ecstasy.

WORLD REPORT

The pills, which cost $10 to $20 US apiece, are sometimes passed off as ecstasy to unwitting users, Glaspy said. Packing a potent mix of highly addictive methamphetamine and caffeine, ya ba can keep users awake for days and has hallucinogenic effects, sometimes causing users to believe they have bugs crawling under their skin.

The drug can be fatal and common side effects include increased heart rate, dehydration, paranoia and depression.

Jeb Bush daughter freed

Orlando, Fla.

Gov. Jeb Bush's only daughter, Noelle, was released from jail Saturday, 10 days after a judge ordered her locked up for violating terms of her court-ordered drug treatment program. Bush left the Orange County jail around 4 a.m. local time.

Noelle Bush, 25, was caught in September with a small amount of crack cocaine by workers at the Center for Drug-Free Living.

This was the second time Bush was sent to the Orange County jail as punishment since she entered rehab in February. She was jailed for three days in July after a worker caught her with another worker's prescription pills taken from a cabinet.

CHATSWORTH, England -- Their transportation system is a shambles, the National Health Service a scandal and public schooling an embarrassment. Still, the British don't complain. But try to ban fox hunting, and this country gets its knickers in a twist.

In a nation where the words "I" and "protest" are never uttered in the same sentence, fur is flying over the likelihood that Parliament will soon outlaw the right of the landed gentry to hunt with dogs.

Even the venerated Duke and Duchess of Devonshire -- who head one of the oldest and most respected ducal families in the land -- are threatening civil disobedience. Should fox hunting be banned, the 82-year-old duke proclaims, he will protest by letting it continue here at Chatsworth, his 12,000-acre estate on the edge of legendary Sherwood Forest.

"I am a very privileged man, and I don't want to break the law," says Andrew Cavendish, the 11th Duke of Devonshire, whose ancestors and their sporting habits can be traced to 1505. "But if the hunts want to disobey, I will also, and allow them to ride."

"People will go ahead and hunt, and if there are martyrs, so be it," echoes the duchess, Deborah Cavendish.

Liberal British politicians, and even some Conservatives, have been trying to ban blood sports since 1949, claiming they are cruel, unnecessary and a throwback to an era when the aristocracy reigned. When Labor Party leader Tony Blair was elected prime minister in 1997, he made outlawing hunting with hounds a key pledge in his manifesto.

A ban has proved elusive, however. Last year, the left-dominated House of Commons voted for it, but the House of Lords, rooted deeply in the land-owning aristocracy, rejected it. (Hunting was suspended for the past year, but only because of fears that rampaging dogs and horses would spread the virulent hoof-and-mouth virus that ravaged British livestock.)

Now, through either some sly-as-a-fox parliamentary maneuvering or a compromise bill, it is all but certain that blood sports in England and Wales will disappear completely within two years or be drastically restricted even sooner.

Protests hound Britain 's fox hunts

Under the little-used Parliamentary Act, if the House of Commons votes two consecutive years for a ban, the House of Lords can be overruled. Meanwhile, some government ministers are pursuing a compromise that would allow hunting with hounds in limited areas.

Public backs a ban

"It's the end of the beginning of the end," House of Commons member Lawrie Quinn says. Quinn represents a largely rural constituency in North Yorkshire, 100 miles northeast of here. Three-fourths of his constituents, his polls show, want hunting with hounds banned. (Nationwide, 62% want it outlawed.) Quinn says he receives more letters, e-mails and phone calls from voters about fox hunting than any other issue -- nearly twice as many as he gets on crime or the crumbling rail service.

As many as 300,000 hunt supporters are expected in London Sunday to march for "Liberty and Livelihood" and the right of English country gentlemen (and gentlewomen) to gallop after a fox -- a sport playwright Oscar Wilde called "the unspeakable in full pursuit of the uneatable." The demonstration could be the largest in postwar Britain, outnumbering an anti-nuclear protest in 1981 that drew a quarter of a million people.

"Irony, isn't it? Now it's the aristocracy marching for their rights," says Derby Mayor Chris Williamson, an opponent of fox hunting and a self-confessed former hunt "sabby," as blood sport saboteurs are called. His town is the largest in Derbyshire, home seat of the duke and duchess.

The duke and duchess themselves once rode to the hunt; two hunts now ride over their land here in the heart of Jane Austen country. (Chatsworth is said to have been the model for Mr. Darcy's estate, Pemberly, in Pride and Prejudice.)

In England and Wales, there are 318 registered hound packs, or hunts, most of which track fox -- although hare, deer, mink and stag also are hunted by dogs.

No casual gathering, a hunt is highly organized. It has a social hierarchy, strict rules of the game and a cast of characters with specific roles and clothing that identify them. Hunts own hounds, horses and sometimes even land. After the riders meet up, the hounds are taken out to find the scent of a fox. When a fox is sighted, one of the riders cries out the traditional "tallyho," the master sounds the horn, and riders follow the dogs -- over hill, dale, shrub and stream.

The thrill is not in the kill, most riders agree, but the ride. "It's a passion! A passion!" says the Duchess of Devonshire. "It's the freedom. The liberty. The danger. You can't understand it until you've done it."

Outlawing hunting, says the Countryside Alliance, the group sponsoring Sunday's protest march, would be a colossal economic blow to the struggling rural areas: The hunts employ nearly 8,000 people and create $ 400 million a year in income for the countryside. A ban, the group says, also will require putting down thousands of hounds and horses and coming up with other methods to control predators.

"Hunting is the best method for managing the countryside," says Clare Rowson, 29, who rides with the Worcestershire Hunt. "For predators like fox, hunting is natural: It's quick, it's clean. A grab to the neck, and it's over and done."

Rowson's sister, Diana, will lead a contingent of protesters from the USA in the march. (There are about 150 hunts in America.) Diana Rowson, who lives in Georgia and rides with the Midlands Foxhounds, hunts coyote because mange has wiped out the fox population where she lives.

Opponents say the practice is barbaric, and pointless. Pitting hounds against other animals, they say, is no different than cock fighting. The animals, tracked or frightened to exhaustion, are then set upon by hounds and often are often disemboweled by the dogs before they die.

Protests hound Britain 's fox hunts

Claims that dogs and horses would have to be destroyed if a ban is passed are disingenuous, says David Ward of the League Against Cruel Sports. Hounds that can't keep up are culled each year, anyway, he says, and pups that don't show a nose for the hunt are killed.

Meanwhile, a study published in the journal Nature this month suggests that hunts have little impact on the fox population. The study, funded by animal welfare groups, showed that fox numbers did not increase last year despite the ban on hunting imposed because of the hoof-and-mouth epidemic. The varmints, some argue, are just not that pesky.

"I've never had a fox in my henhouse," says Gill Purser, who farms 120 acres in the Cotswolds, rolling farmlands 60 miles from London.

Seven hunts ride in that region, among them the prestigious Beaufort, of which Prince Charles is a member; Princes William and Harry also ride in the Beaufort. The royal family, meant to be apolitical, has stayed out of the kerfuffle. But eyes are on Charles' paramour, Camilla Parker Bowles, whose car was spotted sporting a "Liberty and Livelihood" bumper sticker, to see whether she marches Sunday.

Purser, who says she considers blood sports morally offensive, complains that the hunts also are disruptive. Herds of galloping horses, crying hounds and dozens of chase vehicles careering down the country lanes terrify her pregnant ewes and other livestock. The only fox-related poultry death she ever had, Purser says, was when a pack of frenzied hounds stampeded her horses and one stomped on a chicken.

Scotland, which has only 10 hunts, outlawed hunting with dogs in February. Enterprising huntsmen there, and in a few spots of England, are testing foxless alternatives, such as "drag" hunting, in which a scented bag is dragged over a course for the hounds to track. Others are chasing human quarry: bloodhounds put on the scent of people who race ahead of them on foot. If caught, the "prey" risk only being licked to death.

People on both sides of the fence, however, are keeping a close watch to see whether hunts in Scotland abide by the new law during the normal hunting season, which begins in November and runs through spring.

Thousands across Britain have signed petitions swearing to disobey any ban. A violent splinter group of the Countryside Alliance has even sprung up and is threatening to use Greenpeace-style tactics to bring the country to a halt by blocking bridges and roads with horse trailers. Wearing balaclavas and striking at night, the Real Countryside Alliance -- named in the fashion of the murderous Real IRA faction of the Irish Republican Army -- already has vandalized homes and offices of hunt opponents, including those of Lawrie Quinn, the member of Parliament.

A class issue above all

In many ways, this passionate debate may be much ado about something that has little to do with foxes. In what even the Duke of Devonshire calls "this wretched, caste-ridden country," fox hunting is seen as the pastime of "toffs" -- the old landed aristocracy. Until 1918, after all, only landowners were allowed to vote. Although farmers, women and average Britons now ride to the hunt, it remains, the duke says sadly, "a symbol of class divide."

"This is modern-day Britain, and people here have wanted it banned for a long time," says Purser, who says hunting with hounds is still a sport of kings. "What remains of the aristocracy has gotten in the way of democracy."

Would hunters -- the duke included -- be willing to go to jail for their cause?

"It won't come to that," he assures.

If it does, Derby Mayor Williamson promises, sarcastically, "I shall bake him a cake with a file in it."

Cannabis cafe chains set to open in Britain

London

Two Dutch cannabis cafe chains plan to open up to 50 ventures in Britain in a full-frontal assault on police inability to enforce drug laws.

Following the announcement by the British government that cannabis will be downgraded from a class B to a class C drug next year, the firms -- The Bulldog and Dutch Experience -- are planning to open cafes in an attempt to force acceptance of the drug.

The cafes would be illegal even under the new classification. The owners point out that their businesses are also technically illegal in Amsterdam, but their success has forced a change in policy which allows them to operate freely.

The backers believe that in Britain, too, the police will be so overwhelmed by the number of ventures -- and their popularity -- that they would be forced to allow them to remain open.

For Sale: Loo with view of the beach and ocean

London

A former public toilet with a beautiful view of a beach has become the latest example of England's overheated real estate market.

The 42-square-metre former men's and women's restroom overlooking the coast in Dorset, southwestern England, went on the market a few weeks ago for $39,000. But that was before the bidding started.

"We have had several offers already," some rising above $46,000, real estate agent Roy Wootton said Tuesday.

The single-storey building, now privately owned, has planning approval to be converted into a small chalet with a three-metre strip of land for a patio.

"The views are super, with Golden Cap cliff to the left, the sea and beach to the front and (the town of) Lyme Regis to the right," Wootton said.

Fortuyn minister quits over role in Suriname

The Hague

Followers of Pim Fortuyn, the murdered Dutch politician, lost their first government minister within hours after it emerged that she had been a uniformed storm-trooper before migrating to Holland and starting a fresh career as a standard-bearer for women's rights.

The new right-wing government had barely taken office on Monday when it was disclosed that Philomena Biljhout, minister for emancipation and family affairs, served in the bloodthirsty militia of Desi Bouterse in the former Dutch colony of Suriname in the 1980s when it murdered 15 opposition activists.

The fiasco is a bad start for the Lijst Pim Fortuyn, a party that swept the elections in May after the murder of its shaven-headed leader and became the country's second political force.

Britain studies expansion of airports to keep up

London

Europe's biggest airport, Heathrow, could grow even larger under British government proposals to ease air congestion, especially over the capital where some fear that business could flee for the Continent if something isn't done soon.

Government proposals released Tuesday raise the possibility of a third runway at London's Heathrow or a new fifth airport in nearby Kent in southeast England to cope with the growing number of people landing in the region.

The plans have provoked anger among environmentalists and residents groups who are concerned about the damaging impact of construction and increased noise levels.

Britain should come down on loyalist killers: Adams

Belfast

Sinn Fein leader Gerry Adams railed Tuesday against the "surreal" prospect that Britain might crack down on the Irish Republican Army at a time when anti-Catholic extremists were committing most of Northern Ireland's violence.

Adams, whose IRA-linked party is a controversial part of Northern Ireland's Catholic-Protestant government, met with Britain's Northern Ireland secretary, John Reid, following a wave of gun attacks on Belfast Catholics that left a teenager dead and a man wounded.

A gunman operating from a hard-line Catholic area also shot a Protestant, although Sinn Fein said the IRA wasn't responsible.

Court jails two ex-Thyssen managers for tax evasion

Berlin

A court in southern Germany imposed prison terms Tuesday on two former managers of German arms manufacturer Thyssen-Henschel, convicting them of embezzlement and tax evasion in connection with a 1991 delivery of military vehicles to Saudi Arabia.

The Augsburg state court found that the two former managers, Juergen Massmann and Winfried Haastert, took about $10 million Cdn in bribes related to the delivery, money which they failed to declare to tax authorities.

Massmann, a former head of defence technology at Thyssen-Henschel, was given a five-year sentence, while Haastert was sentenced to two years and four months. Their defence lawyers said they would appeal.

WORLD REPORT

Presiding Judge Maximilian Hofmeister said the two managers constructed "a gigantic tissue of lies" to conceal the payments from accounts run by millionaire German-Canadian businessman Karlheinz Schreiber, a key figure in the party financing scandal that tainted former chancellor Helmut Kohl and his conservative Christian Democratic party.

Congo-Rwanda peace pact will require help from UN

Kigali, Rwanda

A proposed deal to end the conflict between Rwanda and Congo, a major factor in four years of war in central Africa, calls for the withdrawal of tens of thousands of Rwandan soldiers from Congo and a possible expansion of the region's UN force.

The deal is the latest attempt to end a dispute that has embroiled six African nations, left more than 2.5 million people dead and defied resolution efforts by mediators from around the world.

The agreement deals with ending the conflict between neighbours Congo and Rwanda that has been the main fuel of the war, but does not solve the country's internal conflicts between the government and various rebel groups.

UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan and South African President Thabo Mbeki, who mediated talks between the two countries, will oversee and verify that both nations stick to their commitments.

Mugabe biting hands that feed his people

Harare

Riot police encircled Harare Tuesday as President Robert Mugabe opened parliament with a ringing denunciation of the countries supplying food aid to Zimbabwe's starving millions.

Opening the first session of parliament since his disputed election victory in March, Mugabe said donors were trying to impose "sinister" political and economic agendas "under cover of humanitarian aid."

More than six million people, half Zimbabwe's population, are close to starvation, according to the United Nations, which says Mugabe's controversial land-redistribution policies are partly to blame.

Grenade explosion kills girl, injures 18 in Kashmir

Jammu, India

A grenade attack at a crowded market killed a young girl and wounded at least 18 civilians in a border town in India's Jammu-Kashmir state on Tuesday, police said.

Police blamed the attack on suspected Islamic rebels, who they said escaped after hurling the grenade at the market in the town of Rajouri, 160 km northwest of Jammu, the state's winter capital.

Three of the wounded were in a critical condition.

More than a dozen Muslim militant groups have been fighting to free Jammu-Kashmir from Indian rule, or merge it with Islamic Pakistan.

Priest listens to church attackers explain reasons

Islamabad

Four Pakistani militants confessed to a parish priest Tuesday that they murdered 17 members of his congregation in a machine-gun attack.

The men, members of the banned Islamic extremist group Lashkar-e-Jhangvi, boasted of their involvement in the worst massacre of Christians in Pakistan since Partition almost 55 years ago.

WORLD REPORT

They met Rev. Roccus Patras in a police cell after being arrested in the town of Vehari in Punjab province.

According to the priest, all of the accused expressed pride in their attack on worshippers gathered at St. Dominic's Roman Catholic church in Bahawalpur last October.

"They said they were satisfied with what they had done," said Patras. "They said it was because of the American attack on Afghanistan.

"They said a lot of Muslims were killed there but nobody was taking any steps to protest, so that's why they planned to kill Christians here in Pakistan."

Eight masked men riding motorcycles raked the congregation at St. Dominic's with automatic gunfire as they arrived for a Sunday service.

Giant squid not a new species, asserts expert

Sydney

A giant squid with unusual muscle growth found washed up on an Australian beach was not a new species as first thought but a damaged specimen, a scientist said Tuesday.

The 250 kg creature was found dead on a beach in Hobart in Tasmania state. It had lost its two tentacles but would have been about 15 metres long.

Experts at the Tasmanian Museum were studying long, thin flaps of muscle attached to each of its eight arms -- like keels -- that they believed were unique to the squid.

But Steve O'Shea, squid specialist with New Zealand's National Institute of Water and Atmospheric Research, said all giant squid had the keels, which were used to help it swim.

Low wind hits Fossett's latest record attempt

Omarama, New Zealand

U.S. adventurer Steve Fossett flew a glider over New Zealand on Tuesday in preparation to soar into the stratosphere, but a local pilot warned the weather forecast did not look good for Fossett's bid to break the gliding altitude record until at least the weekend.

Fossett needs strong surface winds to help him climb toward powerful high-altitude winds he believes will take him to the stratosphere.

The investment tycoon plans to remain in New Zealand for another three weeks waiting for favourable weather to make his record bid.

Wrongfully convicted man freed after 17 years in jail

Buffalo, N.Y.

A 36-year-old man who spent almost half his life in prison on a murder charge has been released after having his conviction overturned.

Angelo Martinez, of Brooklyn, was convicted in the 1985 murder of Rudolph Marasco outside a bingo hall in Queens.

Another prisoner confessed to the murder about a decade ago, his defence lawyer, Oscar Michelen, said. But authorities didn't believe Charles Rivera, a federal prisoner in the witness protection program, because he failed a lie detector test.

WORLD REPORT

Deeper investigation confirmed Rivera's confession that he killed Marasco as a favour to another man.

Lawmaker says plenty of blame to go around for intelligence failures

WASHINGTON (AP) - The chairman of the House panel investigating intelligence failures contributing to the Sept. 11 attacks says there appears to be plenty of blame to go around.

Rep. Saxby Chambliss, chairman of the homeland security subcommittee of the Intelligence Committee, says poor communication by the FBI, poor resource allocation by the National Security Agency and the CIA's refusal to follow a congressional directive are all areas of concern.

The report itself is classified, but an unclassified executive summary was being released Wednesday.

Chambliss detailed one specific area Tuesday, complaining that CIA officials have largely ignored a post-Sept. 11 law requiring them to eliminate guidelines that make it difficult for field officers to recruit unsavory characters to infiltrate terrorist organizations.

Last October, the CIA agreed to alter its requirements, allowing after-the-fact notification of authorities after a spy is hired, but Chambliss insists the agency still hasn't eliminated the guidelines, as Congress ordered.

House passes bill setting new criminal penalties for business fraud

WASHINGTON (AP) - After whisking to passage new criminal penalties for business fraud, House lawmakers were poised to try to resolve differences with the Senate on corporate crackdown legislation to send to President Bush.

The GOP-controlled House, in a hurriedly arranged vote Tuesday, adopted stiff penalties and jail terms for executives who deceive investors or shred documents.

The 391-28 vote reflected Congress' eagerness to respond to voters' anxiety over the economy and turbulence in the stock market. In another bad day on Wall Street, the Dow Jones industrials finished their seventh straight losing session, down more than 160 points.

The Senate on Monday voted 97-0 to create new criminal penalties against business fraud and tighten oversight of the accounting industry.

The House in April had passed an accounting oversight bill - widely considered weaker than the Senate version - but Republicans earlier had blocked the Democrats' attempt to bring up legislation to create criminal penalties.

AP News in Brief

Both the House and Senate bills would create new criminal penalties for corporate fraud and document shredding.

Spanish forces kick Moroccans off of tiny, disputed island; Morocco promises response

CEUTA, Spain (AP) - Spanish troops kicked a unit of Moroccan soldiers off of an uninhabited Mediterranean island Wednesday, taking six Moroccans prisoner for a few hours in the process and intensifying the two nations' dispute over the soccer-field sized speck of land.

The Moroccan government warned it would "not fail to act" in response.

The Spanish operation was the latest move in a standoff that began last Thursday, when 12 Moroccan soldiers landed on the tiny island, set up tents and raised their national flag. The island, known as Isla Perejil to Spaniards and Leila to Moroccans, has been claimed by Spain for 300 years.

News reports said the Spanish operation to evict the Moroccans took place at around 6:15 a.m. Wednesday and involved naval units, special ground forces and combat aircraft. From the hills of Belyounech, a Moroccan coastal village about 200 yards from Perejil, two Spanish flags could be seen flying over the island by midmorning.

Israeli forces search West Bank for militants who ambushed bus, killing eight Israelis

EMMANUEL, West Bank (AP) - Israeli forces conducted a massive manhunt in the rocky hills of the West Bank early Wednesday, searching for Palestinian militants who ambushed a bus near a Jewish settlement, killing eight people.

A premature baby delivered by Caesarean section after the attack died Wednesday, bringing the toll to eight, hospital officials said. The boy, whose mother remained in serious condition, was believed to be the youngest victim of more than 21 months of fighting.

Soldiers carrying out the manhunt shot and killed one Palestinian gunman Wednesday and exchanged heavy fire with others near the Jewish settlement of Emmanuel, where Tuesday's attack occurred, military officials said. Three soldiers were injured, one seriously, the army said.

Israel called off a high-level meeting with Palestinians scheduled for Wednesday after the ambush, whose victims included an 8-month-old girl, her father and grandmother.

The well-planned attack, claimed by three different Palestinian groups, came as officials from a Mideast policy group called the Quartet met in New York to try to come up with a formula to halt nearly two years of Israeli-Palestinian violence and spur resumption of peace negotiations.

Government reports massive increase in citizenship applications since Sept. 11, but approvals drop

WASHINGTON (AP) - The attacks of Sept. 11 sparked an unprecedented surge in the number of people seeking to become U.S. citizens, but fears of further terrorism led the government to take longer in approving hopefuls.

The new numbers, released by the Immigration and Naturalization Service, reflect a changed America.

Larger numbers of immigrants are seeking the prize of citizenship - both to show their patriotism and avoid being caught in the federal dragnet for terrorists that has detained thousands on immigration technicalities since Sept. 11, according to those who work with them.

AP News in Brief

But even with the increase, the number of people granted citizenship between October 2001 and May 2002 dropped by 10 percent from the comparable period the year before, the officials said.

IRA's apology for killing 650 civilians stirs passions in Northern Ireland

BELFAST, Northern Ireland (AP) - The Irish Republican Army's surprise apology for killing civilians stirred passions Wednesday in Northern Ireland, where some welcomed it as a conciliatory and historic gesture while others saw it as a calculated bid to divert attention from ongoing violence.

In a statement Tuesday, the IRA offered "sincere apologies and condolences" to the families of about 650 civilians slain during 27 years of bombings and shootings.

The shadowy group, which called a cease-fire in 1997 but remains a potent force in militant Catholic areas, said it also wanted to "acknowledge the grief and pain" of the families of 1,150 others slain whom the IRA described as "combatants." That term angered many relatives.

The victims include British soldiers, police, prison guards, judges, and Protestant extremists, many of whom were killed either while off-duty and unarmed or otherwise unable to defend themselves. The dead also included IRA members who were executed as informers or who accidentally blew themselves up.

The British, Irish and American governments gave the move a qualified welcome. All three stressed that the IRA must keep scrapping its weapons stockpiles, a goal of the 1998 peace accord here.

U.N. human rights chief calls for arrest of Congolese rebels responsible for massacre

UNITED NATIONS (AP) - The U.N. human rights chief is calling for the arrest of Congolese rebels and civilians responsible for a massacre in the city of Kisangani in May that killed over 180 people.

In a report to the U.N. Security Council, Human Rights Commissioner Mary Robinson blamed Rwandan-backed rebels from the Congolese Rally for Democracy for carrying out "summary executions and extrajudicial killings of civilians, soldiers and police" following an uprising in the port city.

On Tuesday Robinson briefed the council on the report, which was based primarily on an investigation conducted by Asma Jahangir, the U.N.'s independent expert on extrajudicial executions who visited Kinshasa, Goma and Kisangani from June 16-22.

Late last month, Jahangir reported that the RCD rebels who control Kisangani embarked on an "indefensible massacre" to put down a mutiny, killing at least 150 people. She described how people were shot and stabbed to death - and how some were cut open and their bodies filled with stones and thrown into the river to sink.

Markets cheer embattled premier's decision to call early election

ANKARA, Turkey (AP) - Investors cheered Turkish Premier Bulent Ecevit's decision to call early polls in an attempt to end months of political and economic uncertainty, sending the stock market to a rally unseen for weeks.

Turkey's key index, the Istanbul 100, soared 6.3 percent Wednesday to break 10,000 points for the first time since early June. The stock market had dropped nearly 20 percent since Ecevit became ill in May.

AP News in Brief

Reserving his decision to stay in office until his term ends in 2004, Ecevit agreed Tuesday to hold elections Nov. 3 in an attempt to avoid a possible ouster and end months of political uncertainty that has shaken market confidence and imperiled Turkey's economic recovery.

Almost half the legislators from Ecevit's party have deserted the premier in the past 10 days, leaving his three-party coalition government with just half of the seats in parliament.

Parliament is scheduled to convene Sept. 1 for a vote on the election date agreed upon by the coalition partners. Investors are hopeful that the elections will bring in a government determined to implement economic reforms backed by loans from the International Monetary Fund.

Autopsy finds drugs, alcohol in pilot in plane crash that killed Aaliyah

NASSAU, Bahamas (AP) - Authorities are investigating how cocaine and alcohol found in blood tests may have affected the pilot of a small plane that crashed in the Bahamas last year, killing nine people - including 22-year-old singer and actress Aaliyah.

Aviation officials on Tuesday said an autopsy performed on Luis Antonio Morales Blanes showed he had cocaine in his urine and traces of alcohol in his stomach. The autopsy findings were released for the first time along with the crash investigation report, the Bahamas Department of Civil Aviation said.

Investigators are trying to figure how out the substances may have affected the pilot at the time of the August crash. Morales, 30, was sentenced to three years probation on charges of crack cocaine possession 12 days before the crash.

The aviation department also said Tuesday the aircraft may not have undergone fuel-pump wiring modifications required in August 1988.

Aaliyah, who was already a two-time Grammy nominee for best female R&B vocalist, was leaving the Bahamas following a video shoot when the Cessna 402-B crashed during takeoff. All nine people aboard died.

Kile autopsy confirms he died of blocked coronary arteries

CHICAGO (AP) - St. Louis Cardinals pitcher Darryl Kile died from a blockage of the arteries supplying the heart, and there was no evidence that drugs contributed to his death, Cook County's coroner said.

"This is a natural cause of death," Edmund Donoghue, the county's chief medical examiner, said in a statement Tuesday.

Toxicology tests did show evidence of marijuana use, although it was probably weeks before and was not a factor in Kile's death, Donoghue said. Tests were negative on steroids, alcohol, cocaine and ephedrine, a substance commonly found in dietary supplements banned by some sports.

Kile, 33, had a 90 percent blockage in two of three coronary arteries, Donoghue said, confirming his preliminary analysis shortly after the death. He also had an enlarged heart and a blood clot in one of the coronary arteries.

Vitamin pills help violent prisoners behave better

London

Vitamin supplements dramatically improved the conduct of violent prisoners within two weeks and could work on disruptive schoolchildren and other anti-social elements in society, researchers say.

The study, carried out in Aylesbury young offenders institution, a maximum security establishment in Buckinghamshire, is the first evidence that good nutrition has a direct effect on behaviour.

It involved 231 men aged 18 to 21, all volunteers. Some were given tablets containing vitamins and minerals, as well as fatty acids found in fruit. Others were given dummy tablets.

Windsor Star News Services

Within two weeks, among those taking the supplements, there was a 37-per-cent fall in serious reports and 33-per-cent reduction in minor reports. This compared with 10 per cent and 6.5 per cent in those taking placebos.

Overall, over a period of about five months, the number of incidents fell by 26 per cent.

Politicians seek to ease

Northern Ireland crisis

Hillsborough, Northern Ireland

Politicians tried to forge a plan Wednesday to ensure that Northern Ireland's peace accord and the joint Roman Catholic-Protestant government at its heart, survive a summer already troubled by rising street violence.

Police clashed early Wednesday with Irish Republican Army supporters in the Ardoyne district of north Belfast, the Catholic epicentre for sporadic rioting with police and Protestant neighbours during the past year.

World report

Later, with one eye on the crumbled Middle East peace process, the British and Irish governments gathered local politicians at Hillsborough Castle outside Belfast to discuss chronic rioting and other threats to the U.S.-brokered Good Friday pact of 1998, which outlined a compromise future for the British-controlled territory.

Rejection of Sharon war

crimes case casts doubt

Brussels

A Belgian appeals court dismissed a war crimes complaint against Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon on Wednesday in a decision that cast doubt on whether actions against other world leaders under a controversial Belgian law can go forward.

The ruling was the second setback this year for the 1993 law granting Belgian courts "universal jurisdiction" over war crimes committed elsewhere. A decision by the Netherlands-based World Court in February blocked Belgium from prosecuting a former Congolese foreign minister under the law.

While that ruling turned on diplomatic immunity, the three Belgian appeals court judges said the case against Sharon could not proceed because he does not live in Belgium.

The ruling means an end to the investigation into allegations Sharon was responsible for a 1982 massacre in two Palestinian refugee camps in Lebanon.

Spain attacks as Gibraltar

discussions hit dire straits

Jerez, Spain

Negotiations over the future of Gibraltar appeared on the brink of collapse Wednesday, with the Spanish making a concerted attack blaming Britain for the failure.

Some Spanish newspapers claimed that Royal Marines commandos who accidentally landed on the Spanish side of the frontier with Gibraltar last February had, in fact, deliberately staged the "invasion" to destroy the talks.

As Jack Straw, Britain's Foreign Secretary, played host to his Spanish counterpart, Josep Pique, British officials admitted that there had been no progress for weeks over sticking points in the year-long talks on sharing sovereignty of the Rock.

Judge orders doctors

to assess Milosevic illness

The Hague

The UN war-crimes tribunal on Wednesday ordered a full medical exam for Slobodan Milosevic, whose illnesses have delayed his trial by nearly a month since it began in February.

The resumption of the trial was again delayed until at least next Tuesday to allow the former Yugoslav president to recover from what a tribunal spokesman described as "flu and a high fever."

Milosevic fell ill two weeks ago, the second time he caught the flu since his trial began Feb. 12 on 66 counts of war crimes in Croatia, Bosnia and Kosovo during the 1990s. He is the highest-ranking person to go on trial since the court was established in 1993.

Founder of sperm-donor

World report

Web site 'overwhelmed'

London

The founder of an Internet site to provide sperm donors for lesbian couples wanting to have children said Wednesday he has been overwhelmed with 8,000 registrations in the first 48 hours of operation.

The site, launched in Britain on Monday, was set up to provide lesbian couples with sperm for "home insemination." Founder John Gonzalez said 3,000 lesbian couples had already signed up, while 5,000 men had registered to be donors.

The company estimates it will cost about $1,100 Cdn to conceive a child through the service and donors will be paid $115 to $140 in expenses.

Britain's Human Fertilization and Embryology Authority has expressed reservations about the service, saying stringent health screening of sperm is essential to prevent women's health being put at risk.

Antibody linked to women suffering from 'baby blues'

London

Doctors have found a chemical in the body that seems to indicate if a pregnant woman will suffer from post-natal depression.

A study found that women with higher levels of thyroperoxidase antibodies were more likely to suffer from "baby blues."

Prof. Victor Pop, from Tilburg University, the Netherlands, told the Royal College of Psychiatrists annual conference in Cardiff that none of 300 women in the survey had suffered from depression before.

He said this indicated that the thyroperoxidase antibody levels must have been related to depression associated with the pregnancy and not some earlier episode.

Hundreds protest opening of tunnel in Alps to trucks

Chamonix, France

French police used tear gas to push back about 200 protesters who blocked traffic early Wednesday to protest the reopening of a mountain tunnel to heavy trucks after a deadly fire.

On Tuesday, the trucks were allowed to pass through the Mont Blanc tunnel in the Alps for the first time in more than three years.

On March 24, 1999, 39 people were killed when a truck carrying flour and margarine caught fire. The truck burned for two days while firefighters tried to reach people trapped in their vehicles. The tunnel has since been rebuilt to improve safety.

Car traffic resumed in March.

Arap Moi gives Kenyan

World report

MPs 700-per-cent raise

Nairobi

President Daniel arap Moi's government is giving Kenyan MPs a 700-per-cent pay raise as it seeks their support for proposals to postpone this year's elections for a year.

The increase makes the legislators among the best paid in the world. In a country whose economy is in tatters and where 58 per cent of the population earn less than $2 Cdn a day, Kenyan MPs will earn up to $175,000 a year in salaries and benefits alone.

With additional allowances, that figure will rise to more than $220,000, according to the shadow finance minister, Joe Donde.

Last week, Moi's ruling party, Kanu, announced plans to postpone his retirement, scheduled for December, by seeking an extension of the life of parliament by up to 12 months, a move that has drawn widespread criticism.

Tanzanians mass at sports

stadium to identify victims

Dodoma, Tanzania

Covering their noses and mouths with their hands or pieces of fabric, grim-faced Tanzanians gathered in a sports stadium Wednesday and peered at scores of decomposing bodies, trying to identify victims of the country's worst rail disaster.

"It is her. I can recognize the jeans that she was wearing," said Kenneth Muganda, breaking down into tears after identifying his wife.

Regional commissioner Isidore Shirima said 241 bodies have been recovered from the mangled wreck of a passenger train carrying more than 1,200 people that careered backward down a hill and smashed into a cargo train on Monday.

Rescuers were trying to recover an unknown number of bodies still trapped in two twisted coaches of the 20-coach train, Shirima said.

China executes 64 to ## mark UN anti-drug day

Shanghai

China marked UN anti-drug day by executing 64 people accused of drug crimes, officials and state media said Wednesday.

Many of the executions on Tuesday and Wednesday came after public rallies where thousands watched judges condemn the accused.

China usually marks International Anti-Drug Day on June 26 with a wave of publicized executions, underscoring authorities' belief that harsh punishments are an effective weapon against the spread of drugs. Officials from the United Nations have said they do not condone the practice.

Another 188 people also accused of drug crimes were given prison terms of up to life at the rallies.

Indonesians, Timorese face war crimes charges

Dili, East Timor

World report

Prosecutors on Wednesday charged two Indonesian officers and 14 pro-Jakarta East Timorese militia with crimes against humanity for their alleged involvement in the deaths of dozens of people during East Timor's violent break with Indonesia in 1999.

Prosecutor Longuinhos Monteiro filed indictments in a Dili court against suspects allegedly involved in more than 70 killings and four rapes in East Timor's Bobonaro and Oecussi districts in 1999.

The murders include those of two East Timorese citizens working for the UN mission that organized the August 1999 referendum in which East Timorese voted overwhelmingly for independence from Indonesia.

HIV cases on increase

among people over 50

Washington

Despite billboards and public service announcements, brochures in doctor's offices and media reports, older Americans just aren't getting the message regarding AIDS.

People 50 and older aren't following preventive measures to avoid HIV infection and the evidence is in the proportion of older Americans who are being diagnosed with the virus believed to cause AIDS, health officials say. According to the federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, 14 per cent of new HIV cases are among this age group.

Baby born early -- next to cash registers at Wal-Mart

Albany, Ga.

Shenna Williams had started feeling labour pains, but she and her mother thought they had plenty of time to stop at Wal-Mart to buy a disposable camera for the birth.

While her mother, Katherine Williams, was in the store looking for the camera, Shenna's pain increased.

"I heard someone scream out. I said, 'Lord, that's my child,' " Katherine Williams said.

By the time she reached the front of the store early Saturday, her daughter was on a bench by the cash registers preparing for birth.

She helped deliver her grandson, Michael Jerrod Williams. Shoppers and employees watching the birth recorded the event with disposable cameras.

The store donated gifts and Shenna Williams named night manager Adrian Wright as godfather.

Allies Revising Assessment Of Damage to Serb Forces

In the two weeks since NATO forces arrived in Kosovo, alliance officials have had to scale back their initial estimates of the damage inflicted by the 78-day air campaign on the Yugoslav Army, which they concede remains a force capable of maintaining President Slobodan Milosevic's hold on power. A1

German forces in Prizren said they would impose a curfew at night to cut down on lawlessness, which continues throughout Kosovo in the form of slayings, arson and looting. A8

Serbian authorities released 166 Kosovo Albanian men from two prisons in Serbia, in what one prison director called a gesture of good will. They were all detained around May 7 while trying to flee to Albania with their families. Aid agencies believe that the 166 are just a small portion of the total being held in Serbia. A8

Moving Toward Peace in Congo

Negotiations on ending 11 months of war in Congo received fresh impetus when military officials completed a draft cease-fire document at talks in Zambia. A4

Algerian Insurgency's Toll

The Government issued its first comprehensive toll since its seven-year conflict with Muslim guerrillas began, saying 100,000 people had died. It also approved a draft amnesty law for Islamic rebels, the first tangible move to try to end the violence. A6

Hints of Compromise in Ulster

David Trimble, the First Minister of the Northern Ireland Assembly, said the stalled peace effort in Ulster could be saved by a simple statement from Sinn Fein, the political wing of the Irish Republican Army, that the I.R.A. is committed to disarming by May 2000. He did not mention the position he has repeatedly expressed that the I.R.A. must start actual disarmament before Sinn Fein will be allowed to take ministerial posts in the Assembly. Some politicians and analysts said this was a sign that Mr. Trimble was getting ready to compromise. A9

New Movement in Indonesia

Hundreds of nongovernmental organizations have begun to flex their muscles now that President Suharto is gone, pushing agendas that include human rights, environmental protection, workers' protection, legal aid and political freedoms, as well as rights for the poor. All these groups are part of a transformation of Indonesia that is not quite a revolution, but a realignment of the patterns of power, in which the people above now have to listen to what the people below are saying. ## Clinton to Reveal Spending Plan for Budget Surplus

President Clinton plans to unveil sweeping new proposals to allocate the budget surplus among Social Security, Medicare and other spending and tax cut proposals, Democrats said. The proposal, which may be unveiled today, is sure to renew and intensify his long-running battle with Republicans in Congress over the nation's priorities as it enters a new era in which the two parties must divide up pots of money far larger than anything they could have imagined even a year or two ago. Donna E. Shalala, the Secretary of Health and Human Services, moved to head off criticism of the cost of President Clinton's plan to help buy prescription drugs for older Americans, saying the new Medicare benefits "will not be as generous as people think." A13

must renew momentum

London

The British and Irish governments must give renewed momentum to the Northern Ireland peace process, Irish Prime Minister Bertie Ahern said Sunday as he called on all sides to help ease simmering sectarian tensions.

Ahern and his British counterpart Tony Blair have agreed to hold crisis talks on the 1998 Good Friday agreement in a bid to end clashes between rival Protestant and Catholic groups in Belfast.

Ulster Unionist leader David Trimble, who is also the province's first minister, lobbied the leaders last week for an emergency meeting as fresh accusations of Irish Republican Army activity threatened to split his power-sharing government.

Czech Communists find

new life with 41 seats

Prague

The Czech Communist Party staged a revival in the country's general election, winning nearly 20 per cent of the vote on a low turnout in Saturday's poll, its best performance since the Velvet Revolution.

Results confirmed Sunday showed the Communists took 41 seats in the 200-seat parliament, making them the third-largest party. But they are unlikely to be brought into a coalition government.

The centre-left Social Democratic Party is set to lead the next government after it gained 70 seats. The right-wing Civic Democratic Party took 58 seats, fewer than expected.

Secret passage used to strip abbey of rare books

WORLD REPORT

Mont Sainte-Odile

The discovery of a secret passage has explained how hundreds of priceless medieval books and illuminated manuscripts vanished from a monastery in eastern France in the past two years.

A French court heard last week that police caught a 32-year-old teacher who was carrying two suitcases as he emerged from the passage that led to the library at Mont Sainte-Odile abbey near Strasbourg.

The teacher, whose name has not been released, was carrying works from the bibliotheque. At his home, 1,000 more stolen books were found. All were undamaged, neatly stacked on shelves and catalogued by subject.

The culprit told police that he had no intention of selling the works, a course of action that would have aroused suspicion, given their rarity.

Paris

The mainstream right won a huge victory in France's parliamentary election Sunday, forcing the Socialists to surrender control of the National Assembly and giving President Jacques Chirac more power than at any time in the last five years.

Conservative parties together won from 385 to 399 of the 577 seats in France's lawmaking body, exit polls showed.

The left, including the Socialists, the Communists and the Green party, won from 178 to 192 seats. The extreme-right National Front failed to win any seats.

canonization of Padre Pio

Vatican City

Struggling against wilting heat, Pope John Paul declared the mystic 20th century monk Padre Pio a saint on Sunday.

Wild cheers from one of the Vatican's biggest crowds ever -- hundreds of thousands of pilgrims who jammed St. Peter's Square and the nearby streets -- greeted the announcement.

Padre Pio, whose hands were said to have bled for years, was considered the first priest in centuries to show signs of the stigmata -- the hand, foot and side wounds Jesus suffered when crucified.

Accused by some of being a fraud and scorned by many in the Vatican, Pio -- a Capuchin monk who died in 1968 -- attracted a huge following in Italy and abroad. His 1999 beatification drew one of the Vatican's largest crowds ever.

An enormous address book was also found, containing hundreds of names and telephone numbers, all belonging to women aged between 20 and 40.

Skye's Black Cuillins sold

Edinburgh

One of Scotland's most spectacular mountain ranges is to be sold for about $14 million Cdn.

The Black Cuillins, a series of jagged peaks that tower over the island of Skye, will pass into the ownership of an unnamed American by the end of the summer.

The mountains, which offer some of the most challenging and beautiful climbing in Britain, were put on the market two years ago by the chief of the clan MacLeod.

John MacLeod of MacLeod decided to sell the 22,300-acre estate, which has been in his family for 1,000 years, to finance roof repairs at Dunvegan Castle, the 800-year-old family seat.

His decision has met with fierce criticism from walkers, land reformers and mountaineers.

Liberia urges rebels

Vitamins E, C may help

counteract fast food ills

Washington

Researchers have found that high intakes of glucose and high-fat, high-calorie fast food meals both cause an increase in the inflammatory components of the blood.

They also found that an extra dose of antioxidant vitamins E and C can block this inflammatory response in the bloodstream.

The study was done with nine healthy subjects who had fasted overnight and then ate a 900-calorie breakfast consisting of a ham-and-egg sandwich and hash browns from a fast food restaurant.

Blood samples were taken before they ate and one, two and three hours afterward to measure the concentration of oxygen-free radicals, molecules that can damage blood vessel linings and of several blood components that encourage or inhibit inflammation.

With most of the votes from the general election counted, Irish Prime Minister Bertie Ahern's Fianna Fail emerged Sunday as the largest party in Ireland's Parliament.

But the party was expected to narrowly miss winning an absolute majority of the 166 seats in the lower house of Parliament. By Sunday evening, with just five seats still to be declared, Fianna Fail had 80, four short of the number needed to form a government without coalition partners.

Ahern said that a coalition between Fianna Fail and the small Progressive Democrat party was the most likely outcome.

"I think the Irish electorate will say that it makes a lot of sense to go back to the Progressive Democrats," he told Sky News.

The results also showed big gains for Sinn Fein, the political wing of the Irish Republican Army, with the party capturing a seat held by former Irish Foreign Minister Dick Spring of the Labor Party.

The IRA and Sinn Fein pursued for more than three decades a twin-track strategy -- described as employing both the ballot box and the Armalite rifle -- aimed at ending British rule in Northern Ireland.

The rapid surge of Sinn Fein came as somewhat of a surprise to the more established parties who were almost united in condemning the party as dangerous and their methods unlawful.

But none of this appears to have stuck as the party, led by the influential Gerry Adams, began to pick up crucial second- and third-preference votes in working-class districts across the country.

Ireland employs a system of proportional representation in multimember constituencies. Sinn Fein had one seat in the last parliament and will get five or more in the new one.

Sinn Fein -- pronounced "Shin Fayne" -- targeted blue-collar Irish voters with a populist anti-establishment message and campaigned on a wide range of issues that many of the other parties all but ignored.

Martin Ferris, a former IRA gunrunner who spent 10 years in prison for his part in trying to smuggle weapons into Ireland on board a fishing trawler from Boston, managed, to no one's surprise, to top the polls in the North Kerry area, ousting Spring.

Ahern wins Irish poll, coalition likely

"We've run out of luck," said Spring.

He had inherited the seat in 1981 from his father Dan, who had held it since first being elected in 1943.

Ferris, a father of six had campaigned on a platform of no-nonsense politics and was solidly shored up by the huge Sinn Fein publicity machine, which has had considerable success over the years in referendums and elections in Northern Ireland and is now the largest of the parties representing the sizeable minority of Catholics there.

Traditionally Northern Ireland's Catholics -- mainly supporters of nationalist or republican parties like Sinn Fein -- have opposed British rule, while the slightly larger Protestant community -- the so-called unionists -- favor the province's union with Britain.

Ferris was a senior member of the Sinn Fein team, which negotiated and signed the 1998 Good Friday Agreement. The deal, which marked an end to the IRA's campaign of violence, established an elected assembly for Northern Ireland and a power-sharing executive on which both unionists and republicans sit.

Adams, while reminding everyone of Sin Fein's achievement in bringing more than 30 years of sectarian violence to an end and their crucial involvement in the Good Friday deal, has otherwise said very little about events in the north and has instead concentrated on issues more relevant to a population with no real comprehension of what life is like in the troubled province that remains under British control.

"There is a lot of negative comment about Sinn Fein, and the past is constantly being brought up about what we did then, but not very much about what we are doing now. And that is the difference between the other parties and us.

"We are constantly looking ahead, trying to see around the next corner, not sitting around having boring chats about days gone by. We have moved on, and we are all the better for it too.

"We are all about the future of social welfare, farming, health and housing and no one has yet come forward to challenge us on any of these issues; instead, they prefer to criticize and make as much noise about our past as they can," said Martin Horan, a Sinn Fein spokesman.

Attention then swung towards another part of the island, this time a run-down suburb in the capital, Dublin. Sen Crowe, a Sinn Fein candidate came first in the Dublin southwest constituency with a massive 7,466 first-preference votes.

Speaking after the result was announced, Crowe predicted that he would soon be joined by more of his colleagues when the Dail, the Gaelic word for parliament, was reconvened in early June.

Crowe is the first Sinn Fein member of Parliament, or TD, to have been elected in Dublin since Countess Markievicz; a legendary Irish female politician became the first-ever woman to have been elected to parliament, in 1927.

Sinn Fein -- which means "we ourselves" and whose name has sparked comparisons to the Sicilian Mafia "Cosa Nostra" ("our thing") by some of the party's fiercest critics -- has come a long way in a few short years.

It only formally recognized the Irish State and its institutions in 1986. Before that time, its members were forbidden to take part in any political activities in the Republic of Ireland.

It had already tasted success with the election of Caoimhghn O'Caolin from the Cavan-Monaghan border counties to the Dail in 1997. While O'Caolin has kept a relatively low profile in the political scene, he has been very active making new inroads for Sinn Fein at a socio-economic level and has been pivotal in identifying and exploiting weaknesses in the government's supposedly shock-resistant economic policies.

Ahern Sunday pledged to soldier on with his government's economic policies: a commitment to low income tax, pledges to cut corporation taxes, and the removal of those on the minimum wage from the tax net altogether.

Ahern wins Irish poll, coalition likely

"We will continue what we were doing on corporation tax and that has to come down as well as our promises on the minimum wage. And make sure that that is tax free. ... It's not just a question of stopping what we're doing," he said to Sky News.

He once again stated that he would under no circumstances go into coalition government with Sinn Fein and anyway, the Irish constitution explicitly forbids any political party with a private army or militia from entering government.

Ahern knows that even if a coalition deal with the Progressive Democrats turns out to be difficult, there are still plenty of independent TDs who will be eager to help fill out his majority in return for a piece of the parliamentary pie.

But the real impact of Sinn Fein's success -- especially given that they are likely to end up with only 5 or 6 seats -- may well be in Northern Ireland.

The growth in support for Sinn Fein in the republic is likely to be seen as a threat by Northern Ireland's Unionists, many of whom have long been suspicious that the Good Friday Deal is only the first step on a slippery slope to a united Ireland.

The visit of the British Queen in the days before the election was seen as an effort to reassure the Protestant Unionist population which -- despite being in the majority -- often sees itself as under siege.

There has been increasing fragmentation of political and paramilitary groups on the Protestant periphery -- leaving some observers fearing an explosion of violence over the summer.

The so-called Marching Season will provide plenty of potential flashpoints. Northern Ireland's protestant population commemorate important historic dates -- such as the July 12 victory of the Protestant English king, William of Orange, over his Catholic rival James II -- by parading in traditional costumes and with marching bands along routes that sometimes pass through Catholic neighborhoods.

"It may be that while Sinn Fein does well in the south, it simultaneously creates more problems in the north by alienating Protestants with its victories in the Republic," said Jim Hynes, a veteran observer of politics in Dublin. "I wouldn't be surprised if the first item on Bertie Ahern's agenda will be how to shore up a disintegrating peace process in Belfast."

But in any election there are losers as well as winners.

The main opposition party lead by Michael Noonan, the Fine Gael, was seriously crushed in the election and was hemorrhaging seats all over the country.

Noonan took responsibility for his party's performance and quit late Saturday night, telling RTE television his position was untenable.

"I took over the party when there was an expectation of very serious seat losses. A lot of people pledged their faith in me to reverse the decline. I didn't reverse the decline," he told the state broadcaster.

Observers believe that Fine Gael is likely to lose as many as 20 seats -- reducing its role to that of a minority party unable to do its job as an effective voice of opposition.

Not that everything went completely according to plan during the election. A few prospective TDs were splattered by a couple of well-aimed pies, including the unfortunate Noonan and the counting of votes was disrupted in a few places. In the one of the only three areas where electronic polling booths were being road tested, the 7:30 a.m. opening had to be delayed due to a technical malfunction with the equipment, but was very quickly solved when someone found the correct button and switched it on.

In Castlebar in the west of the country, a computer containing Fianna Fail's election details at the count center was damaged by what was described as an "exploding beer barrel."

Ahern wins Irish poll, coalition likely

The party's counters and accountants then had to revert to the tried and tested method of counting the votes by hand. Content: 11003000 11006000 11010000

They're going to have a blast at Carnegie Mellon's University Center tomorrow, and the public is invited to watch (tuxedos and gowns suggested).

The explosion of the student union is just the scene from a movie that's premiering during the campus film festival. But this particular entry is more than a film: It's a student extracurricular project of epic proportions.

Boldly billed as "the sequel to the movie that was never made," "Out of Courage 2" is the 27-minute result of months of effort by more than 150 students from different disciplines. And none of them is filmmaking, since CMU doesn't have a film program.

The movie is of the action genre, as is the story of how it was made.

The director and producer is an electrical and computer engineering senior named Jeb Wilson. But he's been focusing on a filmmaking career since last year, when he made the original "Out of Courage," the "trailer for the movie that was never made."

Completing that 16 mm film was the final for a class he was taking at Pittsburgh Filmmakers. For help, he enlisted his buddy and music composition major Adam Waite. Hearts racing from too much coffee and the trailer for "Armageddon" they'd just seen, they decided to create their own trailer for a stereotypical Hollywood action flick.

They can recite all the classic elements: Violence, romance...

"Quick cuts."

FIGHTS! CAMERA! ACTION!; CMU STUDENTS MIX HOLLYWOOD HOOKS AND EXPLOSIVE PLOT IN SEQUEL TO MOVIE THAT; WAS NEVER MADE PREVIEW "OUT OF COURAGE 2" PREMIERE DURING ....

"Powerful music."

"A narrator with a deep voice!"

Not, in this case, big budget. Their shooting was limited to eight weekends and was stopped a few times by security officers alarmed by guys running around campus with pellet guns.

But within the semester, "JEB CO Productions" wrapped up "Out of Courage." The date movie - or at least, this punchy preview of one - starred then-freshman acting major Stephen Fletcher as a CMU student whose courage in asking out the fetching female lead saves her life and the world from terrorists.

If that makes you feel as uplifted as the American flag at the end, let them tell you how their entry wound up drawing capacity crowds and winning Viewers Choice and Best of Show at the CMU film club's Film Fest 7.

Now comes Film Fest 8, and "Out of Courage" is back, with the subtitle, "Out for Vengeance."

Such a buzz did the original film generate around campus that "You'd hear people humming the music!" recalls acting major Joe Manganiello, whose roommate Arik Luck played the Irish Republican Army bad guy. Manganiello wanted to get in on the lights, camera and action, so he contacted Wilson with the idea to write the same characters into an expanded film this year.

Wilson, meanwhile, spent last summer interning in Hollywood with action-producer par excellence Jerry Bruckheimer, whose credits include "Armageddon," "The Rock," "Top Gun," and many others - "the coolest movies," as Wilson says with a grin.

Wilson mostly was a gofer, but he returned to campus inspired, and Manganiello's idea for "Out of Courage 2" grabbed him by the throat and wouldn't let go!

Wilson: "We just tried to completely overdo the first one."

Judging from the climactic fight scene and explosion, they have succeeded with this feature, which picks up the story five years later with some really bad news for Fletcher's character, Brock Jacobs. Manganiello is the new bad boy, a fanatical Russian named Ruslan Zmeyev. He buys a bomb from Luck's IRA terrorist so he can pursue his own evil designs for world domination - once again, via the renowned Pittsburgh campus.

"A ridiculous plot," Wilson says proudly.

The way this movie came together is even more unreal.

Wilson says, "I wanted it to be as big as possible," but he's gone beyond his overblown hopes.

Thanks to "OC1," "OC2" (as they're now known by insiders) attracted so many would-be actors that he held auditions. And unlike the first time, JEB CO actually had a crew - even a "best boy grip" - thanks to other students who volunteered to do whatever it took.

Manganiello: "There were people who agreed to do makeup for six or seven weeks just so they could get a line."

During shoots, held mostly in University Center - the student union - this January through March, extras stood around into the wee hours for nothing more than pizza.

"You put a little blood on them and they'll stay forever," says Fletcher, who really poured himself into this role.

Others contributed various talents. One student cast all the Russian rifles from plastic. Fletcher helped build, from plaster, the detailed 1/48th-scale model of University Center, which they wired with staggered charges to blow up so spectacularly (watch that park bench fly!).

FIGHTS! CAMERA! ACTION!; CMU STUDENTS MIX HOLLYWOOD HOOKS AND EXPLOSIVE PLOT IN SEQUEL TO MOVIE THAT; WAS NEVER MADE PREVIEW "OUT OF COURAGE 2" PREMIERE DURING ....

Actors with speaking parts include Mary Kate Schellhardt, a drama major who has appeared in "real" movies such as "Free Willy 2" (and who got permission from the Screen Actors Guild to play the female lead in this one). Playing her father and CMU's president is professor Gregory Lehane, who in real life is associate head of the School of Drama as well as a twice-E Emmy-nominated director.

"At this school," Manganiello says, "there are so many brilliantly talented people."

A recent edition of CMU News ran photos of the filming under the headline "Wonder Boys of Our Own," a reference to the real Hollywood film that's been shooting on campus this winter and spring.

"OC2" had a bit smaller budget, of course, but it still has a professional feel, thanks in great part to one huge break Wilson got: Through a drama alumnus he met, a New York camera company rented him a top-of-the-line camera package for free, instead of the $ 50,000 it would have cost to use it for seven weeks.

The filmmakers did have a bigger budget than they thought they would this fall, when Wilson and Waite were awarded undergraduate research grants of $ 1,500. .

As the OC2 excitement built, so did donations from other university sources, including President Jared Cohon and College of Fine Arts Dean Martin Prekop. The filmmakers ended up spending about $ 12,000 - three times what they spent on the original.

This is not your typical student-made art film.

They're all having a blast with it, trying to be as authentically action-flick-oriented as they can. The movie already is listed on the Internet Movie Database (<http://us.imdb.com>), where an anonymous reviewer has breathlessly described it as "a true masterpiece of action, and suspense. The non-stop pacing of the film gives it an energy that pulses on the screen. "

There's even a realistic preview - "approved for all audiences by the Motion Picture Association of America" - that you can view at <http://www.contrib.andrew.cmu.edu/proj/film/oc2/oc2teaser.mov>.

You have to hear Waite's swelling music score, which he recorded in the Alumni Concert Hall with a volunteer orchestra and choir. Computer science major-turned-sound man Matt Sheby used the latest technological wizardry to help put it all together.

The highlight may be the rock anthem that plays while the credits roll, crooned by Luck in such dead-on style that it could go into rotation on Pittsburgh radio.

In fact, the filmmakers plan to eventually sell a soundtrack CD - complete with a techno remix of that song, "(With You Girl) I Can Always Fly" - and they'll be taking orders for videotapes, which they may even package with a copy of the full-color movie poster that yet another student created.

As for tomorrow's premiere, they're having family and friends in, and they want everyone to wear gowns and tuxedos.

What's next? "OC3: Student Loans Come Due"? Action figures? Fast-food kiddie meals?

"I'm still trying to figure out what to do with this," says Wilson, who is graduating. "I suppose I could send it out to agents."

They joke about sending it to Cannes, but they might be able to enter it in other festivals.

Meanwhile, they may try to get it shown to broader alumni or local audiences, who'll appreciate the scenes shot on location at familiar places like the Original Hot Dog Shop in Oakland (the movie credits "the staff of the ' O' as themselves").

Reel competition at film festival

"Out of Courage 2: Out for Vengeance" is one of about 20 films and videos from "Film Fest 8," the annual festival competition of Carnegie Mellon University's film club, called "filmmaking@cmu."

The student-made short works were selected from about 45 submissions. Seats for the festival - about 440 in Mc Conomy Auditorium in CMU's University Center - fill up fast. Tickets are $ 2 for students and $ 4 for non-students, and will be available at the door.

Depending on turnout, an encore showing may be next week. For more information, call 412-268-2107.

IRA scraps more weapons to boost Ulster peace deal

BELFAST

For the second time, the Irish Republican Army has scrapped guns and explosives in a secret ceremony, North American weapons inspectors announced Monday.

The move bolstered the key achievement of Northern Ireland's 1998 peace accord, a Catholic-Protestant government that includes the Sinn Fein party.

Retired Canadian Gen. John de Chastelain, who has led Northern Ireland's independent disarmament commission since 1997, said he and his American deputy, diplomat Andrew Sens, had "witnessed an event in which the IRA leadership has put a varied and substantial quantity of ammunition, arms and explosive material beyond use."

David Trimble, the Northern Ireland government leader who has long battled Protestant hardliners opposed to Sinn Fein's participation in cabinet, welcomed the IRA move as evidence that the group would gradually surrender its entire arsenal.

And Trimble, whose Ulster Unionist Party has a narrow majority of the province's Protestants, said the IRA actions must spur outlawed Protestant groups "to start their own process."

'Gloomy' Jospin sees polls now swinging against him

Paris

France's Socialists are rounding on their presidential candidate, Lionel Jospin, with less than two weeks to go before the first round of voting, accusing him of being stiff and out of touch.

Startled by the strong showing of President Jacques Chirac, Jospin, the prime minister, is being urged to revamp his image as an honest government steward with the razzle-dazzle that French voters like to see in potential presidents.

The French media have got into the habit of showing Jospin looking morose, while Chirac, cosseted by a sophisticated press team led by his daughter Claude, is rarely seen without a huge grin or a baby in his arms.

UN officers wounded in bid to quell riot by Serbs

KOSOVSKA MITROVICA, Yugoslavia

Fourteen UN police officers were wounded Monday as they tried to quell a riot by hundreds of Serbs, a UN spokesman said.

The rioting began when UN police arrested Slavoljub Jovic-Pagi, a leader of a hardline group known as the "bridge guards," said Marko Jaksic, a leader in the Mitrovica Serb community.

The guards, a group of armed men, have in the past tried to prevent ethnic Albanians and Serbs from crossing a bridge that divides the city between the two rival ethnic communities.

Milosevic trial resumes after three-week break

THE HAGUE

The war crimes trial of former Yugoslav president Slobodan Milosevic resumed Monday after a three-week interruption that further set back the courtroom schedule.

A spokesman for the United Nations tribunal said Milosevic had fully recovered from the flu. His illness caused a two-week adjournment, followed by a one-week recess previously scheduled for the first week of April.

The judges ordered the hearing into closed session to protect the identity of the first witnesses, an action usually taken in the case of victims who fear retribution for their testimony.

Delegates meet in Spain to discuss aging world

MADRID, Spain

UN Secretary General Kofi Annan, taking advantage of his birthday, used lyrics from a pop tune Monday to open the UN World Assembly on Aging.

"I turned 64 years old today," he told representatives from 160 countries and international organizations.

"I therefore feel empowered to quote the Beatles' song and ask, on behalf of all older persons: 'Will you still need me, will you still feed me, when I'm 64?'

"I trust the answer is yes," he added to applause.

Globally, the population of people 60 and older is growing by two per cent a year, and seniors are expected to outnumber children for the first time in human history by 2050.

Delegates to the week-long forum are striving to complete a global document to guide policies for the rapidly greying planet, from providing adequate pensions and affordable health care to preventing discrimination and abuse.

Mandela seeks G-8 help in war against AIDS in Africa

PRETORIA, South Africa

Former South African president Nelson Mandela asked Monday for help from the G-8 countries in the fight against an AIDS epidemic that has hit the region hard.

"Let us have enough resources for us to address this problem," Mandela said after meeting Prime Minister Jean Chretien, who will host this summer's G-8 summit in Kananaskis, Alta.

Chretien is on a six-nation tour of Africa to prepare a plan for aid to the world's poorest countries.

WORLD REPORT

Mandela, 83, and still one of the most respected people in Africa despite his retirement from public life nearly three years ago, said he had no advice to offer Chretien in preparing the plan, adding the prime minister seems to have "clear thoughts."

Chretien made no comment during their joint appearance.

Mugabe rivals face threat in a government coalition

Harare

Direct talks between Zimbabwe's government and opposition opened Monday amid concerns that President Robert Mugabe's political rivals were in danger of neutralization.

Negotiating teams from the ruling Zanu-PF party and the opposition Movement for Democratic Change met in Harare, but the talks -- mediated by South Africa and Nigeria -- ended in deadlock after three hours. They will resume Wednesday.

Diplomats are forecasting MDC will come under immense pressure from South Africa to join a government of national unity, but that this could divide and destroy the opposition.

On the eve of the talks, Zimbabwe's army and police mounted a major operation to halt demonstrations. The weekend protests were banned under security laws, and 64 people were arrested for trying to participate.

Hong Kong ejects Chinese migrant for the first time

HONG KONG

A Chinese migrant was sent back to the mainland Monday, the first forced deportation since thousands of mainlanders were ordered to leave Hong Kong by the end of March after a court denied them residency rights.

Ng Ka-tun, 33, was muscled into a van and taken to the mainland after he failed to persuade immigration officials to let him stay several more weeks, said his sister, who did not want her name used.

The deportation came after Hong Kong security secretary Regina Ip warned that some 2,000 migrants staying illegally in Hong Kong would be deported in the coming weeks. Ng's documents allowing him to stay temporarily expired Monday.

Once close ally of Japan's PM may quit over scandal

TOKYO

A scandal-tainted legislator, who was once a close ally of Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi and a former leader of the Liberal Democratic Party, said Monday he would resign from Parliament over alleged misuse of political donations.

Koichi Kato, who had already quit Koizumi's party last month because of alleged tax evasion by an aide, was called before Parliament Monday to testify about that case and additional allegations he misused campaign funds.

During the testimony, Kato said he would resign from politics.

Kato, 62, has been under pressure to quit politics amid reports that he allegedly received political donations worth more than $1 million Cdn in his personal bank account.

Six babies found dead in vacant Tokyo apartment

TOKYO

WORLD REPORT

The decomposed bodies of six babies, five of which were wrapped in bags, were found in a vacant apartment outside Tokyo, prompting police to launch a full-scale investigation Monday.

Housekeepers found the babies in the apartment's closet.

The apartment is located in Toda, a city 20 km northwest of Tokyo.

All six bodies were naked -- five wrapped in a half-transparent bags, one enclosed in a plastic case.

Local news media said police want to question a former female tenant who moved out of the apartment late last month.

After 100 years, workers lay first tracks in rail link

DARWIN, Australia

Workers began laying tracks Monday for a railroad that will complete Australia's long-awaited north-south rail link and provide a new trade route to Asia.

Officials gathered in Katherine, 250 km southeast of the Northern Territory capital city of Darwin, for a ceremony to mark the start of work on about 1,420 km of rails that will cross the desert Outback.

The $1.3 billion Australian ($1.1 billion Cdn) line, which has been planned for a century, will link Darwin -- Australia's closest seaport to Asia -- with the central city of Alice Springs, where it will connect with an existing railway to the southern coastal city of Adelaide.

Asteroid watch goes online for the worried

San Francisco

The prototype of "asteroid-casting" is now online. It's a NASA Web site -- neo.jpl.nasa.gov/risks/ -- that's tailor-made for those space fans, doomsday buffs and otherwise anxious souls who want to plan their busy lives around coming apocalypses.

Dubbed Sentry, it's billed as "an automatic near-Earth asteroid monitoring system."

Launched by NASA's Near-Earth Object Program Office at the Jet Propulsion Laboratory in Pasadena, the site lists 37 asteroids whose orbits may bring them unnervingly close to Earth in the foreseeable future. The site ranks asteroids threats by their statistical probability of occurring.

Hurtling across the solar system at many miles per second, even a medium-sized asteroid could cause immense devastation across a wide region, akin to a small nuclear war.

Many scientists blame the extinction of the dinosaurs 65 million years ago on a much larger asteroid that hit Earth, triggering a devastating climate change and other eco-horrors.

Adventurers quit quest to drive across Bering Strait

ANCHORAGE, Alaska

Two British adventurers have abandoned their attempt to drive a customized amphibious vehicle across the ice and open water of the Bering Strait to Russia, a spokeswoman says.

Russian border authorities had threatened to arrest them, so Steve Brooks and Graham Stratford halted their journey Sunday near the U.S.-Russian frontier in the middle of the strait, said Celia Carey, who has been filming the endeavour.

The men started their Ice Challenger trek from the mainland Friday and reached Little Diomedé on Saturday.

WORLD REPORT

GENTLEMEN'S CLUBS ARE A CHERISHED BRITISH INSTITUTION

Two hundred or so years ago, London was home base for an estimated 2,000 private gentlemen's clubs, a quintessentially English creation whose history has, in many ways, paralleled the evolution of modern British society.

Their members were largely employed in the same profession or at least were of like political persuasion, which, not unexpectedly, was reflected in the institutions' names: Arts Club, RAF Club, Reform Club, Public Schools Club and Press Club.

Other clubs had their own defined identity: Brooks was the famous gambling spot, where men were known to lose millions, and the Athenaeum was intellectually the most prestigious.

While one of the highest compliments was to describe someone as "very clubbable," one of the most painful humiliations a gentleman could endure was to be blackballed, or barred from membership.

And while few Americans have ever set foot into such clubs, most have a very accurate image right at their fingertips: that of wood-paneled libraries and reading rooms, an impeccably trained staff, fireplaces working overtime to ward off the damp, lush carpeting, portraits of the royal family, as well as club members by Royal Academy painters garnishing the walls, and mahogany furniture throughout.

One suspects that this image of the clubs, most of which are located in the West End, is due to the treatment by authors as diverse as Anthony Trollope, William Thackeray, Noel Coward, P.G. Wodehouse and Ian Fleming.

Although their numbers have dwindled dramatically, the gentlemen's clubs remain a cherished British institution, even though today many admit women and frequently advertise for members.

One of the more unusual clubs -- in that its members have always included women and children, and a good number of Americans -- is the Landsdowne.

Located just off Berkeley Square in Mayfair, the building itself was originally the home of the Marquess of Bute, who, in 1762 became George III's Prime Minister. Construction began in 1763 but due to financial problems, Bute sold the unfinished house in 1765 to Lord Shelburne for 22,000 pounds at a loss of 3,000 pounds. Lord Shelburne was made Marquess of Landsdowne in 1784, and the house was to remain in his family until 1929.

GENTLEMEN'S CLUBS ARE A CHERISHED BRITISH INSTITUTION

The next few years saw several changes in ownership until May 1, 1935, when the Landsdowne Club made its debut, says General Manager Jonathan Gill. From the beginning it had the distinction of welcoming men as well as their wives and children. That open-mindedness earned the club a nickname, "the cock-and-hen club."

"We have some 6,000 members today, and there's a considerable waiting list," says Gill. "Members' occupations run the gamut from hairdresser to solicitor."

Gill adds that the Landsdowne is primarily a social institution, with its eldest member reaching 101 years. Children are allowed in the club after the age of 6, and junior members are admitted at the age of 16.

Members are afforded lodgings when visiting London, and local residents can enjoy the club's amenities, including an indoor swimming pool, fencing salle and squash court. The Landsdowne's dining room features smoked duck breast with kirsch and cherries, corn-fed chicken filled with Roquefort and celery, pan-fried skate wing with black butter and capers, and of course, whole Dover sole and grilled lamb.

Yet, in spite of its seeming unconventionality, the Landsdowne Club is an elegantly appointed Georgian edifice, from its grand ballroom to the Adam Room.

In 1988, the Landsdowne underwent significant renovations, including restoring several rooms to the Art Deco style that concurred with the club's opening in 1935.

There's American history here, as well.

In 1782, Shelburne, as prime minister, gave the United States its independence in a peace treaty crafted by Benjamin Franklin and signed in the Round Room. It remains virtually the only room in the house that is unaltered today.

However, most of the clubs did not evolve along the same lines as Landsdowne.

"Originally the clubs began as coffeehouses in the early 18th century," says H. George Hahn II, professor of English at Towson University in Baltimore, "and each was pitched to a particular group, for instance, the Whigs, Tories or merchants."

Lloyds of London got its start as a coffeeshop. The proprietor, a Mr. Lloyd, heard so many tragic stories of lost, stolen or damaged goods from the merchants who frequented his shop, that he diversified his work and got into the insurance industry.

"The social impact of coffeehouses, which evolved into what we call gentlemen's clubs, was immense," says Hahn. "Because only the eldest son could receive an inheritance, there were a lot of aristocratic men who had to seek their own way in the world."

But the name gentleman came from the common man. "In England, the highest form of commoner is the gentleman," notes Hahn, adding that the most exalted gentleman is the knight.

The upshot, he adds, is that men tended to marry late, after they had established themselves. Hence the clubs stepped in and provided virtually everything an unmarried man needed: a place to meet friends, collect one's mail, take meals and entertain. While most of the members kept a small flat elsewhere, it was for purposes of sleeping only.

Perhaps most important, the clubs were places to read the newspapers. Indeed, Joseph Addison and Sir Richard Steele began the "Tattler" and "The Spectator" at Kit Kat Club. "Oxford and Cambridge universities were at their lowest point in terms of academic achievement, and newspapers were simultaneously popularizing knowledge and were reaching more people," says Hahn. "Hence, the coffeehouses became known as 'Penny Universities.' "

Society was changing in other ways as well, becoming both more urban and more commercial. With that came a rising middle class made up of attorneys, financiers and international merchants. According to Anthony LeJeune's

GENTLEMEN'S CLUBS ARE A CHERISHED BRITISH INSTITUTION

"The Gentlemen's Clubs of London," "to meet the demands of the rising middle class, the 19th century generated a whole flock of new clubs, larger, more grandiose, and more solemn."

Furthermore, adds LeJeune, the two club rules were that members pay their own way and behave in a discreet and well-mannered style. Much of those good manners included top-notch conversational skills, as well as at least a superficial knowledge of everything from accounting to zoology. "You had to be considered someone who was 'in the know,' " says Hahn. "But most important, you had to be witty to have clubbability."

Of course, from time to time, things did get out of hand.

LeJeune tells of a Lord Glasgow, who, "having flung a waiter through the window of his club, brusquely ordered: 'Put him on the bill.' " And during the 1970s, the clubs seemed to have been a favorite target of the Irish Republican Army's wrath.

Their greatest days were during the 19th century, up through the first half of the 20th century. "Of course, there were reasons for this," says Hahn. "England was the most prosperous country in the world, virtually everyone was employed, and there was an abundance of wealth."

"And the Victorians loved to show their money, largely by being seen, and the best place to be seen was at the club," says Hahn. "A lot of men would be members of six or eight clubs and visit a different one each night. Lord Mountbatten was said to have had membership in more than a dozen."

Furthermore, since clubs all had their own particular personas, the clever, and well-financed, club-goer could choose a club to match his daily mood.

Nevertheless, after the end of World War II, club membership began a serious decline. Waiting lists, which a century earlier could be as long as two decades, were significantly shorter.

"After 1945, the Labor Party was running things, and it wasn't too favorable toward the clubs," says Hahn. "Another reason the clubs declined was that the war had cost the country a lot."

The decline had actually begun in the aftermath of the First World War.

"Many club members were killed at a very young age and didn't leave any sons to join," says Hahn. "Then there was the Depression in the 1930s, and many members had to cut down the number of their clubs or quit entirely. A number of the clubs merged because of falling membership."

Television was on the horizon, and wives were no longer quite so tolerant of having their husbands away from home several nights a week.

Today, an estimated 30 to 40 prominent clubs remain, many of which admit women, if for no other than economic reasons.

But Landsdowne's Gill begs to disagree. "The clubs really are thriving today," he says. "And most, including ours, have a waiting list that is several years long."

If you go

Green's Restaurant and Oyster Bar, London

* London visitors who desire a sense of club life should head for Green's Restaurant and Oyster Bar (36 Duke St., St. James, London; 011-44-20-7930-4566; best to write ahead for reservations). This wonderful little restaurant has all the elegance and panache that one associates with private clubs, yet Green's is utterly devoid of stuffiness. Indeed, the Green's staff here couldn't be more charming.

GENTLEMEN'S CLUBS ARE A CHERISHED BRITISH INSTITUTION

Owned since 1985 by Simon Parker Bowles, Green's is a particularly popular place for lunch during the work week. Diners can eat at tables or slide into semi-private booths. On the wood-paneled walls are an assortment of framed reproductions of British cartoons, most of which energetically lampoon members of the gentlemen's clubs.

Green's menu includes traditional English dishes, such as bangers and mash with bacon and onion gravy (which translates to a pork and breadcrumb sausage served with mashed potatoes), whole Scottish lobster and grilled Dover sole. On the other hand, there's decidedly un-English fare such as seared tuna with guacamole and wasabi dressing and sesame-fried squid salad with sesame and chili dressing. For dessert Green's offers treacle tart and custard or an array of cheeses with such exotic names as Lord of the Hundred, Bath Soft, Cropwell Bishop Stilton, and Yarg.

For those seeking picnic grub, head to the Green's Web site (www.greens.org.uk). Here you can order up a hamper. Green's was rated tops in 1998 by The Times and full of culinary treasures like Taittinger Champagne 1992, Scottish smoked salmon, Sevruga caviar, Perigord brushes truffles, and Paxton and Whitfield potted Stilton.

And if you're heading off to the races, the Web site offers Parker Bowles' racing tip of the week.

A summary of news from The Associated Press. Some items have moved on this circuit in expanded form with "i" or "f" or "s" category codes:

CAIRO, Egypt (AP)

Pope John Paul II celebrated the first papal Mass in Egypt Friday, touching on the sensitive issue of discrimination against Christians in the mostly Muslim nation. The pope was greeted with cheers, emotional waving and song as he slowly made his way to the altar, dressed in white and gold robes. He responded by solemnly raising his right hand in greeting. He appeared tired at first, bowing his head and raising a hand to an eye during a lengthy introduction in a stadium usually used for squash and other indoor sports. His words as he began prayers in French were slurred, and aides held the text he read. His hands trembled when he later held the pages of his homily. The 79-year-old pope's slurred speech and trembling hands were symptoms of Parkinson's disease, a progressive neurological disorder. (EGYPT-POPE)

Two top generals, seeking reinforcement of NATO forces in Kosovo, briefed the alliance's ruling council Friday on heightened tension between Serbs and ethnic Albanians in the ethnically divided city of Kosovska Mitrovica. Gen. Wesley Clark, NATO's supreme commander in Europe, who appeared before the North Atlantic Council for the second time this week, and Gen. Klaus Reinhardt of Germany, commander of the NATO-led intervention force in Kosovo, spoke to the special gathering of allied ambassadors by videoconference. The Council was debating Clark's request to beef up the 2,500 troops already in Mitrovica, where tensions have been high for the past three weeks. (NATO-KOSOVO)

Russian television on Friday broadcast footage suggesting Russian troops had committed atrocities against Chechens, as Europe's chief human rights advocate met with top Russian officials. The film, which was supplied by the German television station N24, showed a pile of men's bodies in a ditch. The men's ankles were bound with wire, and at least one of the bodies was missing an ear. It also showed soldiers pushing a body wrapped in a blanket off a Russian armored vehicle, and a military truck dragging a dead man across a field. Russian TV networks said the pictures apparently showed captured Chechen fighters whom Russian troops had tortured and killed. (RUSSIA-CHECHNYA-RIGHTS)

TEHRAN, Iran (AP)

With final results of last week's parliamentary elections expected Friday, one of the biggest losers will be former President Hashemi Rafsanjani, once Iran's best hope for economic revival but now branded a promise-breaker. After the latest vote count Thursday, Rafsanjani had garnered just over 25 percent of votes, putting him in the 28th place in a slate of 30 candidates who will represent Tehran in the new Parliament. It was a humiliating result for a senior leader whose supporters had boasted he would win a majority of votes in Tehran and become a possible candidate for the powerful post of Parliament speaker. Only results from Tehran are pending from the Feb. 18 elections. (IRAN-ELECTIONS)

MUZAFFARABAD, Pakistan (AP)

Pakistani officials accused Indian soldiers Friday of crossing over the disputed Kashmiri border and massacring 14 villagers, including four children. India strenuously denied the claim. Several soldiers crept into Lanjod, a village barely 300 meters (yards) from the disputed border, and attacked villagers using knives, Pakistani officials said. The victims were in one house for a religious gathering where they were reading the Koran, the Muslim holy book and sharing food, said a report on the state-owned Pakistan Television. Five seriously wounded victims were taken to a nearby hospital, where one later died. Hospital officials said two of the 14 people killed had been decapitated. (PAKISTAN-INDIA-KILLING)

American ground troops move into Afghanistan

WASHINGTON (AP) - A handful of U.S. special forces are operating in southern Afghanistan, a government official said Friday, opening a significant new phase in America's military response to terrorist attacks.

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld had said Thursday that airstrikes alone will not be enough to rid Afghanistan of the al-Qaida terrorist network. Ground forces will be needed to root out Osama bin Laden and other terrorists and the Taliban that shelter them, the secretary said, though he made no explicit reference to U.S. ground forces.

A senior government official said Friday that a small number of U.S. forces were supporting efforts by the intelligence community to undermine the Taliban regime.

The official, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said military action in Afghanistan could increase significantly in coming days though there will never be a conventional force the size of that used in the Persian Gulf War.

Postal carrier contracts anthrax; FBI tries to trace origin

WASHINGTON (AP) - Federal investigators are trying to track anthrax-laden letters back to their point of origin as a New Jersey postal carrier who may have handled the envelopes tested positive for the disease.

Authorities offered $1 million for information leading to the arrest of those who sent the anthrax.

The female letter carrier who may have handled the envelopes sent to NBC News anchorman Tom Brokaw in New York City and Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle in Washington worked out of the West Trenton, N.J., local post office facility. She and a CBS News employee who opens Dan Rather's mail in New York brought to six the number of people infected with the disease since Oct. 4, including a Florida man who died.

The Washington Post reported in Friday's editions that FBI agents were tracing the mail route of the female letter carrier, who had contracted cutaneous, or the skin form, of anthrax, suggesting the anthrax-laced letters may have come from her route.

Airstrikes ease on Muslim holy day

AP News in Brief

KABUL, Afghanistan (AP) - U.S. jets briefly eased round-the-clock bombardment of Kabul's capital after a pre-dawn pounding Friday, the Muslim holy day. In Washington, a U.S. official confirmed that American special forces were now on the ground in southern Afghanistan.

The handful of U.S. special-forces troops were supporting intelligence work in the south, working to undermine the Taliban regime, the U.S. government official said, speaking on condition of anonymity.

In neighboring Pakistan, the Taliban Embassy's spokesman said Afghanistan's Islamic leaders had no information American ground troops had arrived - but challenged them to come on.

"Fifteen or 20 troops will be able to do nothing," embassy spokesman Sohail Shaheen said in Islamabad, the Pakistan capital.

"If they want to send in soldiers they should send in 100,000," Shaheen said. "Then it can be a fight between our soldiers and theirs. Now it is just a war against civilians."

On the 13th day of the campaign, U.S. pilots returned overnight for new strikes at Kabul.

Other attacks hit Kandahar, the Taliban's southern headquarters, and the eastern city of Jalalabad, one of several provinces where bin Laden's al-Qaida organization has outposts.

Jiang cautions Bush about bombing precision in Afghanistan

SHANGHAI, China (AP) - President Bush and Chinese President Jiang Zemin declared themselves partners in the war on terrorism Friday, although Jiang cautioned that the U.S. air war in Afghanistan must be aimed at clearly defined targets to "avoid innocent casualties."

"President Jiang and the government stand side by side with the American people as we fight this evil force," Bush said after his first face-to-face meeting with his Chinese counterpart.

Bush came here at a time when the sometimes volatile Sino-American relations are on the upswing, but both leaders alluded in a joint news conference to lingering differences.

"The war on terrorism must never be an excuse to persecute minorities," Bush said, an apparent reference to China's treatment of the restive Uighur population in China's northwest Xinjiang region.

Bush said he also stressed the need "to combat the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction and missile technology." On Sept. 1, the State Department imposed sanctions on a Chinese arms producer for allegedly selling missile technology to Pakistan in violation of a U.S.-Chinese agreement.

Thousands protest outside U.S. and British Embassies in Indonesia

JAKARTA, Indonesia (AP) - Thousands of demonstrators rallied outside the heavily guarded U.S. and British embassies on Friday to protest U.S.-led attacks in Afghanistan.

Police estimated that between 5,000 to 6,000 marched through downtown Jakarta.

The peaceful protest, organized by a small Muslim political party, was the biggest in a series of anti- U.S. protests in Indonesia, the world's most populous Muslim nation, in recent weeks.

Hundreds of riot police stood guard behind rows of razor wire. Protesters held up banners that read: "The real terrorists are America and its allies" and "Stop the war."

AP News in Brief

The protest took place as Indonesian President Megawati Sukarnoputri was to arrive in the Chinese city of Shanghai for a summit of Asian Pacific leaders, where she is expected to meet President Bush. The two met for the first time at the White House a few days after the Sept. 11 attacks. At that time, she pledged her support for Bush's war on terrorism. However, she has been under increasing pressure to condemn the bombings in Afghanistan, which critics say have killed Muslim civilians.

Israeli tanks enter Palestinian towns after militia leader killed

JERUSALEM (AP) - Israeli tanks and troops moved into Bethlehem and Beit Jalla in the West Bank early Friday after a Palestinian militia leader was killed in a bomb blast blamed on Israel, a new upsurge in violence despite U.S. appeals for calm.

Atef Abayat, local leader of the Tanzim militia in Bethlehem, died Thursday, along with two other members of his militia in a huge explosion in his car. Within an hour, Palestinian gunmen opened fire at the Jewish neighborhood of Gilo, built on war-won land annexed to Jerusalem. Israeli tanks started rolling into Palestinian territory after midnight.

The Israeli forces took control of hills and houses in Beit Jalla to stop the firing, according to the Israeli military. Soldiers and armed Palestinians exchanged gunfire.

Doctors said seven Palestinians were wounded, three critically, in Israeli fire at Beit Jalla, Bethlehem and another nearby town, Beit Sahour.

In the West Bank town of Ramallah, a Palestinian security officer was killed Friday in a clash with Israeli forces, Palestinian officials said. The Israeli military was checking the report.

In Gaza, a 13-year-old Palestinian boy was killed when a shell he was playing with exploded, doctors and relatives said. They said an Israeli tank fired the shell overnight at the Khan Younis refugee camp.

Ulster Unionists resign from Northern Ireland government

BELFAST, Northern Ireland (AP) - British and Irish government officials were meeting Friday in an attempt to bridge a new fissure in the Northern Ireland peace process, after the province's largest Protestant party quit the unity government over the Irish Republican Army's failure to disarm.

The resignation of the Ulster Unionist Party ministers took effect at midnight, and the British government now has a week to decide whether to suspend the troubled experiment in Catholic-Protestant cooperation.

Britain's secretary of state for Northern Ireland, John Reid, was meeting Irish Foreign Minister Brian Cowen in Dublin for talks on the crisis Friday.

The three Ulster Unionist Cabinet ministers handed in their resignation letters Thursday.

Ulster Unionist leader David Trimble, who resigned in July as the government's leader, said his party had spent 18 months operating a coalition that included militant Catholics from Sinn Fein. However, the party's IRA allies had failed to meet their end of the bargain by disarming.

Cheney visits workers at trade center site

AP News in Brief

NEW YORK (AP) - Helicopters hovered over the financial district to guard Vice President Dick Cheney as he spoke with workers at the World Trade Center wreckage for the first time.

"I'm trying to think if there's anything I've ever seen that rivals this," Cheney said Thursday as he walked through the trade center site wearing a red-white-and-blue hard hat.

Accompanied by New York Mayor Rudolph Giuliani and Gov. George Pataki, Cheney shook hands with firefighters, signed construction hats for the workers, and talked about how he had watched the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks unfold from the White House.

The visit, one of the few public appearances Cheney has made since the attacks, was just part of the background for students at nearby Stuyvesant High School who worry that the still-smoldering debris has been making them and their teachers ill.

About 80 of the school's 3,200 students and teachers have complained about headaches, nausea, sore throats and trouble breathing. Several students were wearing respirator masks at school Thursday.

One of four bodies recovered from sunken Japanese ship identified

HONOLULU (AP) - Divers have recovered four bodies from the wreckage of a sunken Japanese fishing ship that was rammed in February by an American military submarine.

The third and fourth bodies were brought to the surface from the Ehime Maru on Thursday, the same day the body of the first high school student pulled from the wreckage was identified through dental records.

Naval authorities and the Japanese consulate notified the family of Katsuya Nomoto, 17, that his body had been found and removed from the fisheries training vessel late Wednesday. The city medical examiner said the cause of death was drowning.

Yankees dock Mariners 3-2 in Game 2

SEATTLE (AP) - After six days and four cross-country flights, the New York Yankees have gone from the verge of first-round elimination to a streak leading to a possible fourth straight World Series trip.

Everything has changed for Seattle, too. Those 116 regular-season wins have become a tightening noose around their necks, no longer a mighty accomplishment, now merely a burden.

"We just have to keep doing whatever we're doing," Mariano Rivera said after completing Thursday's 3-2 win over the Mariners.

Slumping Scott Brosius sparked a three-run second inning, Mike Mussina slid by without his best stuff and Rivera got his 22nd straight postseason save.

Freddy Garcia, who got the Mariners' only two wins over New York in last year's ALCS, pitched on three days' rest for just the second time in his career. He allowed five of his first 10 batters to reach and couldn't escape a second-inning jam.

Paisley's party has edge in North Ireland elections

Belfast

Voters cast their ballots Wednesday to choose a new Northern Ireland Assembly, but many doubted the results would breathe new life into the suspended Catholic-Protestant government.

Analysts forecast a surge of Protestant support for the Democratic Unionist Party led by Ian Paisley. The anti-Catholic firebrand vows to block any new power-sharing administration involving Sinn Fein, the party linked to the Irish Republican Army and backed by an increasing number of Catholics.

Even the Ulster Unionists, although part of a previous coalition including Sinn Fein, now say they won't repeat the experience unless the IRA renounces violence and fully disarms.

Given the Protestant resistance, the British government has signalled that it will wait weeks, or perhaps months, to convene the new assembly.

Compiled from Star News Services

Results for all 108 seats will be announced Friday.

Prosecutors say 46-year sentence is not enough

The Hague

Arguing that 46 years in prison is too lenient, prosecutors asked an appeals court of the UN war crimes tribunal Wednesday for a life sentence for the only man convicted of genocide in the Balkan wars.

Bosnian Serb Gen. Radislav Krstic, 55, also appealed both his conviction and the sentence handed down by the tribunal in August 2001. His defence lawyers sought a reduction in the sentence, arguing it was never proven beyond doubt that Krstic knew the 1995 massacre of Bosnian Muslims in Srebrenica was being carried out by his troops.

The defence also sought a mistrial, arguing that prosecutors failed to provide advance disclosure of evidence that would have been in Krstic's favour.

WORLD REPORT

Between 7,000 and 8,000 Muslim men and boys were killed in Srebrenica in what was the worst slaughter of civilians in Europe since the Second World War.

Town looks at new name to make Mafia tie go away

Rome

Moves to change the name of the Sicilian town of Corleone to rid it of its Mafia associations are sharply dividing the community.

The initiative to rename the town, population 12,000, is the idea of an association of local professionals, who complain that the existing name is a Mafia byword.

They are as tired of being linked to the Corleone family of the Godfather books and films as they are to the bloodthirsty, real-life clan of the same name.

The association has suggested restoring the original name of Cuor di Leone (Lion's Heart).

But its campaign has been greeted by criticism.

Even Pippo Cipriani, the former left-wing mayor who once wrote to Mario Puzo, the author of The Godfather, complaining that he had unfairly "exported throughout the world the cliché that Corleone is the capital of the Mafia," was opposed.

"It's madness," said the current centre-right mayor, Nicolo Nicolosi.

Turkish court charges suspected accomplices

Istanbul

A Turkish court on Wednesday charged at least three suspects, two of them women, with involvement in last week's deadly suicide bombings in Istanbul.

The new arraignments bring to at least 18 the number of people charged as accomplices to the two suicide bombers who on Nov. 20 blew up trucks outside the British Consulate and a British-owned bank. Six others were earlier charged in the Nov. 15 attacks on two synagogues in Istanbul.

The two days of bombings, carried out by four suicide bombers driving explosive-packed trucks, killed a total of 57 people.

Officials have blamed Turkish militants backed by international assistance, possibly from al-Qaida.

EU redraft ends right of foreign policy veto

Brussels

A change of wording in the latest draft of the European Constitution published Wednesday would strip nations of their veto in all foreign policy.

Ignoring warnings that the British government is prepared to veto the text unless major changes are made, legal experts in Brussels and Rome have stepped up the pressure on Britain and offered little beyond "declaratory" gestures in the fields of taxation, social security, criminal justice and energy policy.

The latest version, released in advance of a tough bargaining session in Naples this weekend, empowers the EU to decide foreign policy by qualified majority voting for the first time.

Jordanian in terror plot gets four years in jail

WORLD REPORT

Duesseldorf, Germany

A Jordanian convicted of helping plot terror attacks against Jewish targets in Germany received a lenient four-year prison sentence Wednesday after providing insights into his radical Islamic group and its links to al-Qaida.

Shadi Abdellah, 27, a Palestinian with Jordanian citizenship who once was a bodyguard for Osama bin Laden, was one of nine suspected members of the Al Tawhid terror group arrested in Germany last year on suspicion of plotting imminent attacks.

The Duesseldorf state court said the sentence -- less than half the maximum of 10 years -- rewarded Abdellah for his testimony on the Al Tawhid cell, its planned targets and the months he spent as a "confidant" among bin Laden and other top al-Qaida members in Afghanistan.

Atomic agency censures Iran for past coverups

Vienna

The United Nations atomic agency censured Iran Wednesday for 18 years of secrecy, issuing a resolution that the agency's head said gives him more muscle in policing the country for evidence of nuclear weapons ambitions.

Warning Tehran to stay in line, Mohamed ElBaradei, director general of the International Atomic Energy Agency, said the measure sends an "ominous message that failures in the future will not be tolerated."

The text, adopted by the 35-country board of governors of the IAEA, was weaker than the U.S. had sought.

It avoided a direct mention of the UN Security Council -- which has the power of imposing sanctions -- to allow for compromise between the U.S. administration and key European powers seeking weaker wording.

Minister tells Chirac not to stand for re-election

Paris

President Jacques Chirac is facing a palace coup after his chief party rival warned him not to run for re-election in 2007 but instead to let "democracy breathe again."

Nicolas Sarkozy, appointed interior minister 18 months ago, told a private audience that France should introduce term limits.

His remarks cut right to Chirac's greatest weaknesses: his age, growing decrepitude and a sense among voters that he is washed up, too comfortable in his trappings and disinterested in domestic problems.

Chirac would like to stand for re-election to a third presidential term in 2007 when he will be 74. He is doing all he can to minimize the issue of his age.

Villagers celebrate first full ceasefire in 14 years

New Delhi

Villagers on both sides of the India-Pakistan border celebrated Wednesday the first full truce in 14 years between the armies of the nuclear-armed neighbours, visiting relatives and places of worship.

The ceasefire, which began at midnight Tuesday, does not cover Indian security forces and Islamic militants in Kashmir.

But there was no firing Wednesday along any part of the 1,126-km frontier, said Indian army headquarters.

The start of the ceasefire coincided with the Eid-al-Fitr festival that ended Ramadan and there was not even any celebratory gunfire to mark the holiday, officials said.

Mick Jagger criticized for holidaying in Myanmar

Bangkok

Mick Jagger has come under fire from campaigners for democracy after taking a holiday in military-controlled Myanmar, either in defiance or ignorance of widespread calls for a tourism boycott.

The 60-year-old Rolling Stone arrived by private plane last Friday and left on Tuesday, 7-Day News magazine reported Wednesday.

Aung San Suu Kyi, Burma's opposition leader and Nobel Peace laureate who is being held in detention, has repeatedly asked foreigners not to visit.

She argues tourism legitimizes and enriches the ruling generals, while staying away applies pressure to bring them to the negotiating table.

The British government has urged its citizens and travel companies to steer clear of Myanmar because of its "well-documented cases of human rights abuses associated with the tourism industry," including forced labour to build roads and hotels and forcible relocation of communities.

Judge jails conman, 82, for defrauding state

Melbourne, Australia

A judge paid tribute Wednesday to an 82-year-old fraudster's resilience, then jailed him for 30 months.

Raymond Lewis Oughton was convicted of defrauding the government to the tune of 270,000 Australian dollars (about $254,000 Cdn) by claiming benefits for an elderly couple he invented back in the 1970s.

He had pleaded guilty to 11 counts of fraud at an earlier hearing.

"One cannot help but admire your resilience," Victoria state County Court judge Michael Strong told Oughton, who has been handed a total of 22 prison sentences since doing time for the first time in 1939.

"But I have to say you are one of the most dishonest and disreputable individuals I have been called upon to sentence," Strong added.

Oughton will likely serve just 10 months before being paroled.

Israel defiant as U.S. cuts back on loan guarantees

Washington

Israel Wednesday brushed aside a $380-million Cdn punishment from the Bush administration. The money was cut from loan guarantees to signal disapproval of settlement building and the security fence in the West Bank.

Zalman Shoval, a senior adviser to Ariel Sharon, the prime minister, said Israel would continue building the barrier with or without punitive loan guarantee measures.

Officials on both sides signalled that the punishment was lighter than expected.

A few weeks ago, Bush administration officials predicted a cut in loan guarantees now, followed later by further reductions, to account for the costs of building the fence.

Presidential hopeful Dean attends return of remains

Hickam Air Force Base, Hawaii

WORLD REPORT

Democratic presidential contender Howard Dean joined family members Wednesday for the emotional return of the remains of three Americans and an Australian missing since the Vietnam War. Dean believes one of the Americans was his brother.

Remains tentatively identified as those of Charles M. Dean and his friend, Australian Neil Sharman, civilians travelling in Southeast Asia when they were killed in 1974, were discovered this month buried in a rice field in central Laos. The other two sets of remains were unearthed in northeastern Laos.

"While we are saddened that he is not still with us, we are comforted by the fact that he is finally coming home," Dean said.

He spoke with reporters just before four coffins were unloaded from a U.S. air force C-17 cargo plane and carried to a bus for transit to the military's nearby forensic laboratory.

The procedure has been repeated scores of times as remains of missing soldiers and others continue to be recovered from the Vietnam War era.

YOUNG PRINCES - The most commonplace activities of a young royal can be whipped into a media frenzy. A new book on 'Wills' and Harry portrays Prince William as a one-man wrecking crew among the girls. Fact, or fantasy?

Shock, horror! A teenage boy finds leggy blondes attractive! He has been known to smoke the odd cigarette or two! He suffers from hangovers after boisterous parties! He loves cars and wants a motorcycle! He hasn't decided what he wants to do when he grows up!

The parents of most 19-year-old boys would be breathing a sigh of relief -- "Phew, is that all?"
The Washington Post

But when the 19-year-old boy is second in line to the British throne, even the most commonplace of pleasures becomes whipped up into a frenzy of tabloid headlines.

Last week, Britain's Prince William found his life the subject of intense media speculation once more with the publication of a much-disputed book, Diana's Boys: William and Harry and the Mother They Loved.

Among other things, the book portrays the young prince as a "one-man wrecking crew" among the girls. "Is Playboy Prince a Sex Machine?" screamed the tabloids, recalling for some early stories about his uncle Prince Andrew and - difficult as it may be to believe now -- his own father.

Even the news that Diana's butler had been arrested for theft, and that the Queen is reported to be warming to the idea of a marriage between Prince Charles and his sweetheart, Camilla Parker Bowles, couldn't compete with new and juicy gossip about William and his brother, Harry, 16.

Author Christopher Andersen names William's closest girlfriends as glamorous English aristocrats Davina Duckworth-Chad and Emilia "Milly" d'Erlanger, and claims the prince has at the same time been enjoying a "steamy" e-mail correspondence with model and presidential niece Lauren Bush. (She denied this to The Washington Post in May.)

Andersen claims there was plenty of "bed-hopping" in William's year off before college, when he visited Chile on behalf of the charity Raleigh International.

Spokesmen for the royal family reacted quickly, dismissing the claims as "utterly contemptible" and "ludicrous allegations." Andersen himself says the newspapers have blown it all out of proportion, and says he sees his book as a "tribute" to the boys and their mother.

Diana's Boys ...

So, fact or fantasy? The one thing we can be sure about is that since his mother's death four years ago, His Royal Highness Prince William Arthur Philip Louis -- or "Will Wales," as he has chosen to be known until he completes his education -- has tried to tell us as little as possible about his life.

The British media have abided by a gentleman's agreement to stay away from William and Harry while they finish their schooling. But now that William is due to start undergraduate studies at the University of St. Andrews in Scotland, that protection may dissipate.

Andersen's book, published in New York by William Morrow, isn't for sale in the United Kingdom, but quotes from it -- and the palace reaction -- have been published by media in Britain and elsewhere.

"There is an enormous fascination with William and Harry in America," said royal historian and biographer Robert Lacey. "It's thought of as on a parallel with John F. Kennedy Jr., but in fact it's even more than that. It's as if Marilyn Monroe had had children."

Interest in the young man whom unauthorized royal biographer Kitty Kelley has dubbed "half movie star, half rock star and ... probably the saving grace of the monarchy" is currently at fever pitch. When it was announced that he was going to St Andrews, admission applications rose by 44 per cent -- 90 per cent of the increase accounted for by young women.

William and Harry, Diana once said, "are my one splendid achievement." The poignant sight of the two princes bravely walking behind their mother's coffin moved many.

There were fears about what would happen to the two, who had lived most of their lives in the all-out verbal warfare that was their parents' failed marriage.

At nine, William was passing tissues under the bathroom door to soothe his sobbing mother; when Harry was nine, his father went on national television to discuss his infidelity with longtime mistress Parker Bowles.

Diana was revealed as a bulimic self-harmer who had had affairs herself; Charles coldly shut himself away from his wife's grief.

Royal-watchers speculated that it would be a surprise if the boys turned out even halfway normal, coming from a family that one journalist called "the maddest since the Munsters."

And all that was before their mother's life was tragically cut short.

Four years later, Andersen's book and other press reports make the princes sound far more than halfway normal (with the proviso that these, like most "inside" revelations from the palace, are basically uncheckable). They are close to their father and have accepted his relationship with Parker Bowles. William and Harry are devoted to each other, even if Harry is determined to outdo his older brother on the ski slope and polo field.

Of course, there are the inevitable rumours about William's love life.

Andersen claims that in Chile, more than once "William's bodyguards reportedly looked the other way while he was locked in a passionate embrace with a female volunteer."

Andersen also suggests William was seen spending the night in a tent with two women, "one blonde, one brunette."

Kelley, appearing on Larry King Live, summed up what many might have felt when she retorted: "Christopher, I think you'd have a worldwide exclusive if you told us that this glorious-looking young man joined a celibate Benedictine monk abbey."

Diana's Boys ...

Not that there haven't been more serious risks. Five high-profile aristocrats in William's circle have been caught taking drugs -- among them Tom Parker Bowles (Camilla's son) and Tara Palmer-Tomkinson (the daughter of close friends of Charles) -- but there's no suggestion William has used drugs.

The worst that's been said is that he had a massive hangover after one New Year's Eve and that he apparently smokes, a habit that Andersen speculates would have enraged his mother.

Andersen also claims that in the last year William has been at the centre of as many as 20 security scares involving such terrorist groups as the Real IRA, a radical offshoot of the Irish Republican Army. The severity of these threats is as yet unclear.

But, said Lacey -- author of Royal: The Lives of the House of Windsor, to be published next year to commemorate the queen's Golden Jubilee -- for all the tales of nightclubs and wild living, the real William is very different. A military career is by far the most realistic option, he believes.

"He's a very traditional straight kind of guy," Lacey said.

"It's often forgotten that he began his gap year (between high school and college) with the Welsh Guards in Belize. He likes that sort of thing. And the army would give him the privacy he wants."

Andersen reports that William told one volunteer: "I rather like American girls. ... I can easily see myself marrying one." But most royal-watchers in Britain say he's far more likely to stick with "his own sort" -- aristocrats he's known for years -- terrified as he is that he could be set up by the press. William is said to have a real disdain for the media.

Two years ago, he skipped a skiing vacation rather than face intrusion by the paparazzi.

"My own particular reading of the situation is that the queen and Prince Charles are very permissive," Lacy said, "and that the boys have responded to that by taking on the traditional aspects of the royal family, happy to take on their duties and at ease with their destiny."

Andersen calls this being "Windsorized" -- Diana's achievement being unacknowledged, much as her Spencer relatives have been cut off from the boys. "There has been an effort by the royal family to airbrush Diana out of the picture," he said. "It reminds me of the Soviets."

William's humanitarian work in Chile, however, suggests that the training for public life that Diana began has had an influence.

"Diana's legacy lives on in the boys," said Andersen.

"But they are also her final revenge in the war of the Windsors. They are still her boys."

Lacey said that "here in Britain we must try very hard not to place these ordinary human beings with all the weight of expectations that were placed in Charles and Diana, which they both disappointed."

William and Harry "are sensitive young men, they are trying to lead private lives. And I don't think that spreading who they may be going out with ... is good for them."

Others, like Andersen, disagree, saying that media reports about the princes are necessary and inevitable: They are, after all, public figures, second and third in line to the throne.

"I think it is doing (the princes) a disservice to have this wall between the public and the boys," said Andersen.

"Diana understood this; she wanted them to be like John Kennedy Jr. and embrace the media with humour, style and grace. ... William needs practice; he cannot expect to be left alone."

Just as his mother was the most celebrated woman in her time, he is going to be one of the most celebrated figures of the 21st century."

Compiled by United Press International New York Times A backdoor effort to undermine abortion rights has emerged in a proposal circulated by the Federal Department of Health and Human Services to expand the availability of prenatal care. While the goal is unassailable, the method surely is not. The goal is to provide insurance coverage for pregnant women in families that earn too much to qualify for Medicaid, thus enabling them to get prenatal care. But the plan under consideration by Tommy Thompson, the secretary of health and human services, looks to be designed primarily to advance the right-to-life movement's longstanding goal of establishing a legal precedent for recognizing the fetus as a person. Under the proposal, which is described in a draft letter to state health officials, states would be allowed to define an "unborn child" as eligible for medical coverage under the federal Children's Health Insurance Program, known as CHIP. The qualifying beneficiary, in other words, would be the fetus, not the pregnant woman, but counting the fetus as a child would allow prenatal services to be delivered to the mother on its behalf. Like the benign-sounding Unborn Victims of Violence Act, which the House passed in 1999 and again this April, the plan is a backdoor assault on Roe v. Wade. Thompson need not take this approach. He can encourage states to obtain federal waivers to cover these women under the CHIP program, as two states already have. Instead he is pandering to anti-abortion groups with a proposal designed to further their political agenda.

* 0- Los Angeles Times It still isn't often that Catholics and Protestants in Ulster agree on politics. As the renewed political crisis in the region deepens, however, moderates are linking arms on three key issues. First and foremost, that the Irish Republican Army must begin putting its arms beyond reach right now. Second, the British government must accelerate efforts to make the police force accountable and impartial and to recruit more Catholics on the forces, which are still heavily Protestant and mistrusted by Catholics. Third, it must renew its commitment to reducing its military presence in Ulster. The pressure, however, is on the IRA and its political arm, Sinn Fein. As Seamus Mallon, Catholic leader and deputy first minister of the Northern Ireland Assembly, pointed out, the IRA and Sinn Fein cannot claim to believe in the political process while keeping illegal weapons hidden. Mallon is far from being the only leader urging Sinn Fein and its associates to live up to their long-delayed commitment to put their weapons "beyond use." Nobel laureate John Hume, Irish Prime Minister Bertie Ahern, his British counterpart Tony Blair and dozens of editorials in newspapers throughout Europe and the United States have called on the IRA/Sinn Fein leaders to honor their commitment. The 1998 Good Friday agreement leaves no doubt: "All participants accordingly reaffirm their commitment to the total disarmament of all paramilitary organizations." The disarmament process was meant to be completed by June 2001. To date, no paramilitary group in Ulster has handed over one weapon. The recent resignation of David Trimble as first minister of the Assembly and the proximity of the Protestants' so-called "Marching Season," celebrating military victories long past but still deeply resented by Catholics, are ominous signs. Under the rules of the power-sharing government, the British and Irish governments have six weeks to solve the crisis. If their efforts fail, Britain could suspend the Ulster government or call for new elections. Both options would set back the peace process. Suspension would undermine the credibility of the agreement. New elections might polarize attitudes further. To avoid either, the British and Irish governments must work harder for a climate of trust, with swift progress on the police force and demilitarization. Sinn Fein must respond with the same speed, disarming to keep the peace process alive. This is what unarmed citizens, both Protestant and Catholic, so clearly desire. * 0- Washington Post The plea deal reached by federal prosecutors and lawyers for Robert Hanssen serves both major government interests at stake in the case. By ensuring that Mr. Hanssen serves the rest of his life in prison, it offers an appropriately stiff punishment for the particularly damaging espionage in which this former FBI counterintelligence official engaged over many years; Mr. Hanssen's betrayals are at least partly responsible for the executions in Moscow of Russians who worked for the United States. By agreeing to forgo the death penalty and allow Mr. Hanssen's family to receive a portion of his pension, however, prosecutors also gain a chance to debrief the spy extensively during the six months between now and his sentencing. Even those who would have preferred an execution should understand that this access is more important. It should allow the government to assess the damage Mr. Hanssen caused and pinpoint the vulnerabilities in FBI security procedures that Mr. Hanssen was able to exploit. Fixing those vulnerabilities is the task ahead. No system can ensure perfect security. There will be smart and unscrupulous would-be spies at an organization the size of the bureau who find cracks to slip through. But the bureau's resistance to the sort of security measures imposed on other agencies with sensitive missions made it too easy for Mr. Hanssen. It seems crazy that Mr. Hanssen could rise through the ranks of the bureau's most sensitive sections without ever taking a polygraph exam. Mr. Hanssen spent lavishly on a stripper with whom he was friendly, while also carrying large amounts of debt and doing renovations on his house-all without setting off alarm bells. How could he and the few hundred other FBI officials doing this most sensitive sort of work not have been subject to more rigorous scrutiny? The FBI is now requiring polygraph exams for roughly 500 such officials. This is a start. A number of continuing reviews will undoubtedly make other recommendations for tightening security further. The key will be actually to implement the reasonable suggestions that emerge. Such sensible proposals for reform have been floated before but always incompletely implemented. The price of such negligence is too high. * 0- Boston Herald The United States objects to Israeli killings of Palestinian terrorists. On this issue, Israel is right. "They are extrajudicial killings, and we do not support that," said the outgoing U.S. ambassador to Israel, Martin S. Indyk. Secretary of State Colin Powell had similar remarks the next day. But the killing that soldiers do in battle against armed enemies is also extrajudicial - done without benefit of a court order, such as a death sentence. Pacifists object, but other moral codes do not judge soldiers to have sinned or committed a crime. What Indyk and the U.S. government must allow for is the fact that Israel is in a war. The security cabinet says it kills terrorists, in operations it calls "interceptions," before they can carry out attacks. If these killings are confined to preemption or prevention, they are as legitimate and as blameless as any other justifiable homicide in self-defense. Good reasons may arise at times not to undertake them, but that is true for any military tactic. The right remains. There is a line here, and many temptations to cross it. There have been times when Israel's internal security agency, the Shin Bet, has killed terrorists after capture. That is completely wrong; Israeli society and the government agree, condemn such actions and try to punish the perpetrators. When a Palestinian mob stoned two Israeli teenagers to death last month, and when another mob stabbed two captured Israeli soldiers to death in October, the silence of Palestinian leaders was deafening. Israel has captured one Aziz Salha and accused him of taking part in the killing of the soldiers - the Palestinian Authority refused to arrest him. He will be put on trial. That is the appropriate way to proceed. The State Department must not equate defense against terrorism with terrorism itself. * 0- Honolulu Star-Bulletin After a rocky start in U.S. relations with China, President Bush has begun rebuilding contacts with Chinese leaders, and should be commended for that. However, he is going about it the wrong way and should revise his tactics. The president had hardly taken office when a Chinese fighter pilot sideswiped an American intelligence plane over international waters in the South China Sea. The Chinese pilot crashed while the Americans made an emergency landing in China and were detained for two weeks. After much bickering, China permitted the United States to ship the plane home, where it arrived yesterday. Not so coincidentally, President Bush called President Jiang Zemin yesterday to resume what White House spokesman Sean McCormack called a dialogue. "The return of the airplane allows the two sides to focus on the bilateral relationship," he said. McCormack further told the Cox News Service: "The president said he looked forward to going to China in October," when he plans to attend an economic meeting in Shanghai. There's where the president and his advisers suffered a lapse in judgment. The State Department also disclosed yesterday that the Chinese have begun trials for an American citizen and a U.S. permanent resident on charges of spying. Both are of Chinese descent and are among about 30 holders of U.S. passports who have been detained in the past year. The citizen is Li Shaomin, who teaches in Hong Kong, and the resident is Gao Zhan, a professor at American University in Washington. In protesting the trials, the president and the State Department have been right to stay low key in public. In private, every administration official from the president on down should make clear to the Chinese that there will be no presidential visit until all Americans have been released. President Bush has leverage in this instance and should apply it judiciously. Jiang Zemin wants to be seen at home and abroad as the equal of his predecessors, Mao Zedong and Deng Xiaoping. A visit from an American president would enhance Jiang's prestige while declining the invitation would surely hurt his standing. Secretary of State Colin Powell plans to travel to China later this month. He should make clear, even if out of the public eye, that American concern for human rights and civil rights extends to the most obscure citizen and legal resident-including those who belong to minorities. * 0-

Re: An absence of leaders, editorial, Oct. 7.

It occurs to me that if the St. Petersburg Times believes that every leader in the current Middle East conflict is inadequate, then perhaps it is the Times that has an inadequate grasp of the true nature of the Middle East conflict.

Two of the current leaders are democratically elected, Ariel Sharon and George W. Bush, and the rest are not. Those who are democratically elected represent the will of their people. The Israelis elected Sharon because they had tried the techniques you espouse as "leadership." These approaches - giving away land, ignoring the other side's military buildup, and engaging in unconditional negotiations - were miserable failures, and the Israeli people refuse to negotiate under this formula any longer. President Bush, to his credit, refuses to make exceptions to his war against terrorism in order to prod the Israelis into more pointless negotiations.

More "leadership" is desperately needed. The Palestinians need leadership that will not only fight terrorism but also stop hate-inspired education, media-inspired incitement, and provide transparent government with due process. The Arab world needs democracy, due process and equal rights for women and homosexuals. Demanding across-the-board "leadership" without recognizing the cause of the problem and the need for the will of peoples to be expressed and respected is hollow and smacks of political correctness.

Taking a stand for peace

Re: Pilots to be disciplined for protest, Sept. 26.

Applause, cheers, hooray and amen! I want to congratulate the Israeli pilots who signed the letter refusing to participate in the bombing of Palestinian terrorist leaders when it is reliably known that these raids will cause collateral damage to civilians. These brave men have put morals above their careers.

I hope that most Israelis agree with them. I would also like to believe that when viewed by Palestinians and other Muslims around the world it is accepted that because a government can't compromise, the individual person can.

Hopefully, this will inspire those backing the Palestinian effort to rethink peaceful solutions. The Mideast problem cannot be decided by killing. It must be gained by the individual taking a stand for peace.

Dedicated to Israel's destruction

Re: Syria hit shows Israel is stuck, Oct. 7.

Susan Taylor Martin's incisive column highlighting the problem posed by Syria is very timely. Our government has made it clear that Syria harbors and supports terrorists. Despite our warnings, Syria continues its support of terrorist groups, such as Hezbollah and Palestinian Islamic Jihad. The hypocritical United Nations and its European and Arab supporters even have the gall to give Syria a key role in the United Nations.

Of particular interest to us in the Tampa Bay area is the fact that Ramadan Abdullah Shallah, the current head of Palestinian Islamic Jihad, was brought to Tampa as an "Islamic scholar" by Sami Al-Arian, the University of South Florida professor in jail awaiting trial on terrorism charges. Shallah continues to dispatch homicide bombers from his sanctuary in Syria. It should be noted that Shallah would not allow the name Israel to be used in his classes at USF. In 1996 Shallah wrote that Palestinians would "not concede a single meter" of land to Israel.

As for the suggestion that perhaps a charismatic Palestinian like Marwan Barghouti might provide an answer to the problem, this appears to be wishful thinking as he has sponsored terror and, like Arafat and Shallah, seems dedicated to the destruction of Israel and the creation of an Arab Palestine in its place.

What should be clear to those with open minds is the fact that Israel is willing to accept an Arab Palestine that poses no threat to its existence. What, sadly, is equally clear is that there is no Palestinian leader willing to accept the existence of the Jewish state of Israel in its ancient homeland.

Israel's foes are many

Re: Syria hit shows Israel is stuck.

Susan Martin's column regarding the Israeli strike on Syria is off the mark on several key points.

First, Martin describes those Palestinians who wish to replace Israel with a fundamentalist Islamic state as "a small but radical faction." Radical they certainly are but both Jewish and Palestinian polls show that Hamas enjoys popularity equal to Arafat's. Four separate Jerusalem Media and Communication Center polls in 2002 each found that more than 4 in 10 Palestinians favored liberating "all of historical Palestine," which just happens to include Israel. Those factions can hardly be considered "small."

Martin's idea that Israel negotiate with the Islamic terror groups in a manner that the British did with the Irish Republican Army is faulty in comparison. The IRA sought only independence, not to replace England with a fundamentally religious state. Israel is facing a large faction that wants no compromise, and who see the West Bank as a stepping stone to Tel Aviv.

Israel is protecting itself

Re: Israel and the Palestinians.

If Mexico or Canada were launching terrorist homicide bombings from within their borders upon U.S. citizens in our territory, would the United Nations call for America to be restrained in our response? And would the United States even listen to those absurd suggestions? Of course not!

Those who would blame Israel for protecting its own population from terrorists are delusional in denying the facts.

Here's a fact that is undeniable:

If the Palestinians laid down their arms, they would get peace, and would achieve their goal of statehood. If Israelis laid down their arms, they would get annihilated.

Except for the death of innocents, terrorism achieves nothing.

U.S. needs to wake up

Re: Israel to build homes in West Bank and Crying for choices in the Middle East, by Thomas L. Friedman, Oct. 3.

It appears our government's policy toward the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is in complete disarray; the American-backed road map to peace is defunct.

The Israeli Housing Ministry announced plans to build 600 new homes in three large Jewish settlements in the West Bank. This follows by one day the Israeli government decision to continue building a wall deep within the West Bank to guard Jewish settlements.

The Bush administration made no formal condemnation of Israel's actions. Israel's prime minister has been a leading proponent of settlement building for decades.

In a poll by Zogby International in the October issue of The Link, a publication of Americans for Middle East Understanding, it was reported that Arab attitudes toward Americans and American culture were positive. However, 72 percent of those polled said the Palestinian issue was the most important in the Middle East, and 89 percent disapproved of U.S. policy toward the Palestinians.

Tom Friedman, normally a supporter of Israel, concludes his article on choices as follows: "a vast majority of Israelis want a decent, normal society, but their ideologically driven leaders are lost in space And the Bush team, which should be acting as a reality check, has fallen so deep into the pocket of Ariel Sharon you can't even find it anymore."

We seem to have fallen asleep on the Israeli-Palestinian problem while focusing on Afghanistan, Iraq, Iran and Syria. We don't seem to be listening to the people who live in the area. I hope we wake up.

Joseph A. Mahon, St. Petersburg

Turning a blind eye to terrorism

At the United Nations a Security Council resolution has been introduced for Israel to stop committing acts that could threaten regional security. Who's kidding whom? The United Nations has always turned a blind eye to those who have been upsetting the so-called "regional security" for decades. When is the last time the United Nations held any of the Arab nations accountable for the acts of terrorism perpetrated against innocent civilians? When has the United Nations censored the Palestinian Authority, specifically Yasser Arafat concerning his lack of control and indifference over Hamas, Palestinian Islamic Jihad, Hezbollah and other terrorist cells?

Speaking of Arafat, we are told by Forbes that he is one of the wealthiest men in the world. He is worth millions. Has the United Nations initiated an investigation making him accountable for the millions that he has accumulated in the past few years? Have American taxpayers contributed to this as well?

Just as we Americans and this administration reserve the right to destroy bomb factories and cells of terror in Iraq, so, too, Israel has the right to destroy these same cells before they are used to blow up the lives of Israeli citizens, both Jews and Arabs.

Better way to blunt OPEC

Re: A patriotic tax that we'll never pay, Oct. 7.

Tom Friedman is a great journalist and an expert on the Middle East. I've enjoyed his columns and books for years.

Unfortunately, when he strays from his field of expertise, he runs onto the rocks. In this column he promotes the idea of a $1 per gallon tax on gasoline as a means of achieving a host of good things. He fails to measure the effects of an increased tax on the current recovering economy and, further, panders to the Luddites of the radical environmental groups.

Contrary to his argument, the way to defang OPEC is to cut the price of fuel by drilling for more of it at home and getting more of it from other non-OPEC suppliers. Any Econ 101 student knows that if the market is flooded with lots of oil, the price will inevitably drop. That's the approach to put a crimp in OPEC and also the way to provide for the longer-term benefits of all consumers worldwide.

So, Tom, forget the tax and go for helping the investments in Kurgistan, Russia, and other places that have enormous reserves of oil and get on board the drilling initiative in the northern wastes of the Alaskan arctic. By these means we could blunt OPEC and also have plenty of oil to burn as we each see fit while keeping our economy growing.

John J. Christman, Tierra Verde

Energy bill seeks short-term answers

Re: Back president's energy bill, letter, Oct. 7.

American dependence on foreign oil is a great cause for concern. But instead of likening environmentalism to fanaticism, blaming Democrats, and promoting the president's energy bill, why don't we look at the real reason we are in this mess?

There are new technologies and better, cleaner energy sources that have been discovered or are just waiting to be discovered. Too many interest groups like oil companies put such considerable pressure on the government that other fuel options are barely explored and rarely developed.

The president's energy bill is only interested in short-term solutions. Raping our natural resources to drain that last drop of oil will only buy a little more time. Do we really want to leave future generations an even bigger mess?

IN WILDLIFE TRICKS, FIND WAR LESSONS

WASHINGTON - Wily hawks and deceptive squid may one day provide a key war lesson.

With a battle for Baghdad looming, a Rand Corp. team is cautioning the Pentagon about the consequences of pitting U.S. forces - relatively unskilled in trickery - against sneaky Iraqi warriors in the buildings and back roads of the ancient capital.

Rand specialists are even urging top brass to study survival tactics of wildlife, from manipulative birds and evasive marine life, to downright duplicitous plants and bugs.

For instance, the African devil flower, a monstrous-looking mantid, looks like a flower, complete with fake flies - the better to lure insects to its "petals." The insects are soon devoured.

An African bug, acanthaspis petax, sneaks into ant colonies by concealing itself beneath the bodies of dead ants.

In essence, flowers and insects have been doing for millions of years what Iraqi soldiers have been doing to U.S. forces for a number of days.

The Rand team's alarming conclusion as U.S. forces inch toward Baghdad: "Deception is an adaptation as valuable as armor, speed or firepower," yet "deception is given short shrift in terms of the time soldiers spend learning or practicing the art of the ruse."

From the time of the wooden horse in Troy 3,000 years ago, ingenuity and guile have played decisive roles for underdogs in battle, and is an effect amplified on an adversary's home turf. It happened in Mogadishu, Northern Ireland and Grozny. Urban combat can negate a superpower's technological and numerical edge.

But even before this war in Iraq exposed U.S. vulnerability to an enemy's dirty tricks and guerrilla-like tactics, the Pentagon began to recognize the need to better understand - and sometimes adopt - the unconventional manipulations of scrappy adversaries.

Report Advises Military To Learn The Art Of Deception From Nature

Pentagon officials have in recent weeks revised a guiding policy known as "Joint Doctrine for Military Deception." The document embraces, for the first time, the notion of comprehensive training in how to "deliberately mislead adversary military decision-makers."

Soldiers Not Tricky Enough

The Rand warfare team warned that "for U.S. forces not to receive the training or tools to leverage the [urban combat] environment as well as or better than our adversaries do is a sorely missed opportunity."

The point is not just to fight better but to save lives, said Rand analyst Scott Gerwehr, chief author of the report.

He lists advantages of incorporating lessons of the animal world in such training: "Reduced casualties, reduced detections by the enemy of your forces, the increased likelihood of surprising the enemy, more options you can carry out - generally, more burdens on the adversary, because they're lost in your world of mirrors. You might be pulling a single bluff, a double-bluff, or a triple cross, and they wouldn't know."

The Pentagon is said to be taking the suggestions seriously, especially now that generals are learning firsthand of the complexities of tackling an elusive enemy who employs a full arsenal of treacherous tactics, including ambushes, car bombings, and soldiers masquerading as civilians or U.S. soldiers.

"The military leaders who are prosecuting this war are painfully aware of the information and psychological dimensions of the conflict, but this doesn't mean everything they do is effective or well planned," said Gerwehr, who is privy to details of classified U.S. operations.

But many Americans don't view many of the tactics as honorable. Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and U.S. Central Command chief Gen. Tommy Franks often condemn the deadly antics of the Iraqi militia.

The U.S. has its own bag of tricks, including some deployed by highly skilled members of CIA A-teams and Delta Force units, or simply U.S. statements that such units are being deployed.

In the Iraq war, words are seen as important as weapons.

But U.S. attempts at deception tend to be ad hoc, not ongoing and consistent at every level.

"Our Marines and soldiers are as tricky on the ground as anybody," Gerwehr said. "They learn quickly all the tricks of the trade to keep them alive and expose adversaries. But it's not an area we focus on doctrinally or in training as much as would be tremendously beneficial."

Enemy Fights 'Dirty'

Among the most vivid descriptions of what U.S. troops soon may face in Baghdad was written in The Times of London recently by Gen. Wesley Clark, the former commander of NATO forces in Kosovo.

The Iraqis, he predicted, will fight "close and dirty," their tanks darting in and out of buildings and alleys. Snipers will shoot from high windows and rooftops. Seemingly innocent civilians, even women and children, will explode in surprise attacks.

If Clark is right, the dreaded ambushes and deadly fake surrenders near Basra and other southern Iraqi cities merely foreshadow the gruesome and fearsome road ahead. Soldiers will dress as civilians. The enemy will attack seemingly secure areas to the rear, and target command posts.

"The Iraqis will be prepared to conduct high-risk missions of the kind we would not consider," Clark wrote.

In Pentagon parlance, conflicts between high-tech forces and unconventional adversaries are called "asymmetric warfare."

Report Advises Military To Learn The Art Of Deception From Nature

An example that many moviegoers would find familiar occurred in Mogadishu, Somalia, in 1993 - the shooting down of one of the most hardy helicopters, a Black Hawk, with a rocket-propelled grenade.

Military organizations of other nations, especially China, Britain and Russia, have embraced more formalized training in employing deceptive tactics and countering them, viewing such techniques as critical to success as weaponry and munitions.

The British Army in particular was accustomed to the dirty deceptions of nasty street fighting before encountering Iraqis in Basra. But even skirmishes against the Irish Republican Army in Northern Ireland barely resemble the terrain or arsenal available to the Iraqis.

The Lessons Of Nature

Turning to animals and insects for more tricks of the deception trade might seem, at first, rather odd.

But the Rand report argues valuable lessons can be learned not solely from military history, but from "the unforgiving nature of natural selection" - the way deceptive techniques provide an evolutionary advantage.

Biologists for years have studied how certain tricks have enabled species to survive, avoiding death by tricking predators. But now the Rand group argues the knowledge should be incorporated into military operations.

"In the animal kingdom," the report states, "ruses of virtually infinite variety are applied to offense, defense and intelligence gathering." Those that do go on to breed successive generations.

"Deception techniques should be cultivated in our soldiery with the same level of emphasis on basic firearms skills," the report states. "In interviews with soldiers, Marines or other servicemen, deception is deemed a life-saver."

Turning clever ideas and technologies into deception techniques for war "would be of incalculable value in the urban jungle," the report states.

Survival Of The Sneakiest

Scientists long ago reached the same conclusion. Many biologists believe, in fact, that the ability to deceive is the most important factor in the survival of species.

One of the sneakiest is the Sepioid squid, which responds to a potential threat by releasing a cloud of ink. The ink, swirling in the water, assumes a shape resembling the squid. The squid, meanwhile, changes color and darts away. The squid's evolutionary achievement suggests advantages not simply of camouflage, but using it while moving.

Already, aircraft such as the Stealth bomber are designed to show up on radar as much smaller or different than they really are.

The squid's behavior suggests the potential for developing technology to cloak aircraft from radar in a way that causes the image to appear as though it's moving in a different location and direction.

The zone-tailed hawk, native to the Southwest United States, is a tricky predator, hunting while flying with turkey vultures. The hawk mimics the vultures, which rodents generally ignore because they are harmless. Thus the hawk easily snatches them away from positions in the open.

One possible lesson of such traits is the benefit of hiding within densely populated areas. Sorting complex information is more difficult in such a setting, or when accompanying, say, seemingly innocent civilians.

Technological War Of Deception

Report Advises Military To Learn The Art Of Deception From Nature

Nobody would argue that the Western military lacks for cunning and deception, especially when it comes to technology, and among certain war planners, generals and Special Operations forces.

In Iraq, the U.S. military is, in fact, engaging in what may be history's most technologically advanced war of deception and counter-deception.

Special aircraft jam and rebroadcast radio and television programming. Statements spread around the world by embedded journalists, such as apparently flawed reports of an uprising in Basra, also may help deceive the enemy.

Some innovations have already borrowed directly from the animal world. A Canadian version of the Hornet jet fighter, the CF-18, has a false cockpit painted on its underside, providing the illusion that it is moving in the opposite direction. Many creatures have false heads and eyespots.

But deception is hardly integral at every level or part of basic training for every soldier. American culture inherently resists the notion that deception can be good.

But the Pentagon's deception doctrine quotes Niccolo Machiavelli: "Though fraud in other activities be detestable, in the management of war, it is laudable and glorious, and he who overcomes an enemy by fraud is as much to be praised as he who does so by force."

But fraud, even the kind that engenders success, is not always so well received when disclosed in U.S. society.

The value of deception in war, while widely appreciated, is understudied, Gerwehr, the Rand analyst, said.

"Some of these questions have already been asked in the animal kingdom," he said, "and it is important to us to explore their applications in warfare."

Earth has a 'close shave' as large asteroid wings by

London

An asteroid the size of a football field and large enough to raze a major city missed the Earth by just 125,000 km last Friday, a distance considered by astronomers to be a "close shave."

In one of the closest known passes of an asteroid to Earth, the space rock passed well within the orbit of the Moon at a speed of more than 23,000 mph, but it was not detected until Monday. Had the asteroid, called 2002MN, struck a built-up area the damage and loss of life would have been similar to that caused by a large nuclear bomb.

The asteroid, which was between 28 metres and 100 metres across, was detected by astronomers from the Lincoln Laboratory Near Earth Asteroid Research Project in New Mexico.

It was only the sixth asteroid known to have penetrated the Moon's orbit and by far the biggest.

Blair vows investigation into 1989 killing of lawyer

London

British Prime Minister Tony Blair pledged Thursday his government would "get to the bottom" of allegations that Northern Ireland security forces aided the killers of a Catholic lawyer in Belfast 13 years ago.

Blair was responding to a BBC documentary that included a secretly recorded interview with a Protestant militant named Ken Barrett, who said he was one of two gunmen who burst into Patrick Finucane's Belfast home and shot the lawyer several times in front of his wife and three children.

Barrett accused a senior police officer and the British army's senior agent within his organization, the Ulster Defence Association, of playing key roles in arranging the murder.

Catholic politicians and Finucane's family have campaigned for years for a foreign-led inquiry into the slaying.

Finucane specialized in defending Irish Republican Army suspects.

Men fire at car carrying Moscow's deputy mayor

WORLD REPORT

Moscow

Unidentified gunmen fired on a car carrying a deputy mayor of Moscow on Thursday morning and one of his bodyguards and a young man were wounded, a police official said. A body was later found in the assailants' abandoned car, which was on fire.

The deputy mayor, Losif Ordzhonikidze, was not injured in the shooting, which took place on one of Moscow's major highways during morning rush hour, said Lt.-Col. Anatoly Shershevnyev, a Moscow police official.

The 19-year-old student, who was riding in a minibus near the scene of the shooting, was also wounded by gunfire and taken to the hospital, said a Moscow police spokesman.

Six burned by low-flying fighter during exhibition

Stockholm

A fighter plane flew too low during an exhibition at a military airport in central Sweden on Thursday, burning six people on the ground, three seriously.

The Swedish-built Viggen (Thunderbolt) fighter jet came in too low over a group of visitors after taking off from the airport near Uppsala, 60 km north of Stockholm, spokesman Christer Ulriksson said.

The injured -- three men and three women, all in their 20s -- were among visitors standing some 50 metres from the runway.

Ulriksson, a press officer with the air force's F16 wing in Uppsala, didn't know exactly how low the plane was flying, but speculated that it couldn't have been above 20 metres, judging by the injuries.

Millions of strikers bring Spain to a crashing halt

Madrid

Millions of Spanish workers joined a general strike Thursday, bringing airport and rail station closures, clashes with police and a bleak welcome for EU leaders heading for the Seville summit.

In searing heat, around a third of the workforce observed the country's first general strike in eight years, called to protest labour reforms proposed by the centre-right government.

Almost every part of the public transport system, including most buses and airplanes, were cancelled. Every sector from newspapers to amusement parks succumbed to the protest.

Queen's reign now fourth longest in British history

London

Queen Elizabeth becomes the fourth longest-reigning monarch in 1,000 years of English history today.

Only three ancestors have enjoyed longer on the throne: Victoria, George III and Henry III.

Elizabeth II, who acceded on Feb 6, 1952, overtakes Edward III, who was proclaimed king on Jan 25, 1327 and died on June 21, 1377, reigning for 50 years and 148 days.

Taking into account leap years, the Queen has reigned for 50 years and 149 days.

But she will have to reign until 2008 to overtake the 56-year record of Henry III (1216-1272) and until 2012 to beat the 59 years of George III (1760-1820).

Victoria is the longest-reigning monarch with 63 years and 216 days.

WORLD REPORT

To surpass her great-great-grandmother, the Queen must reign until Sept 11, 2015, when she would be 89.

Pig had foot-and-mouth symptoms: Government

London

A pig showing the symptoms of foot-and-mouth disease was found at a slaughterhouse in Lincolnshire in eastern England Thursday.

All livestock movements in an eight-km radius of the slaughterhouse was banned.

The livestock market at Selby, north Yorkshire, where the pig is thought to have come from and 34 farms have been closed while vets trace the pig's movements back to the original farm.

An investigation has also been launched to trace other pigs that might have come into contact with the suspect animal.

A government spokesman said: "The symptoms indicate it is either foot and mouth disease or swine vesicular disease."

Chinese coal mine blast kills 58; scores missing

Beijing

A massive gas explosion Thursday in a northeastern China coal mine killed 58 miners with scores more injured or missing, the official Xinhua News Agency reported.

Twenty-five miners had been rescued from the Chengzihe mine in Heilongjiang province and eight of them were receiving emergency treatment in a hospital, Xinhua said.

The agency said about 140 miners were working underground when the explosion occurred and still were missing.

The mine's general manager, Zhao Wenlin, was among the missing. He was inspecting work in the shaft when the blast occurred at about 9:45 a.m., Xinhua said.

Pakistan to curb Koran schools in crackdown

Islamabad

President Pervaiz Musharraf opened a new front in Pakistan's crackdown on Islamic militants Thursday by giving religious schools six months to register with the authorities or face closure.

Thousands of Madrassahs, or religious colleges, have sprung up in Pakistan and many are viewed as hotbeds of Islamic militancy. Afghanistan's Taliban movement was originally founded in Pakistani Madrassahs.

Before gaining official government recognition, all Madrassahs will have to teach a broad curriculum, covering English and mathematics as well as Koranic studies and seek clearance from the government for any foreign students.

Opponents predict political ruin from major shake-up

Hong Kong

Opponents warned of a political catastrophe Thursday as Hong Kong's Beijing-backed leader prepared the biggest government shake-up since Britain surrendered colonial control.

Chief Executive Tung Chee-hwa, who had planned to reveal the new cabinet lineup today, subsequently delayed the announcement until next week to give the central Beijing government time to approve the choices.

WORLD REPORT

Tung was expected to name political appointees to jobs once held by civil servants -- a reshuffle that his critics are dreading as a massive tightening of his control.

Lesbian sues over attire for yearbook photograph

Tampa, Fla.

A high school student who was not allowed to pose for her senior yearbook picture in a jacket and tie has filed a lawsuit in federal court, claiming the school's actions violated her constitutional rights.

Nicole "Nikki" Youngblood, 17, alleges in the suit the Robinson High School dress requirement for yearbook photos is discriminatory.

All female students are required to wear a scoop-necked drape and all male students must wear a white shirt, tie and dark jacket.

Youngblood, a lesbian, hasn't worn traditionally female clothes in several years.

President declares war on the evil of excess fat

Washington

President George W. Bush, a self-styled fitness fanatic, urged Americans Thursday to take responsibility for their ever expanding waistlines and start taking some exercise.

"The evidence is clear: A healthier America is a stronger America," Bush said, welcoming 1,500 guests to a sports fair on the White House lawns.

While it is doubtful that Bush's call to action will rouse the 61 per cent of American adults deemed overweight or obese, the president's fitness obsession has already galvanized one group of citizens: White House officials, who have, almost as one, miraculously discovered long-buried urges to get fit and "go for the burn."

Desperate to impress a president who runs five km a day, lifts weights, eschews alcohol and likes to be in bed by 10 p.m. they are flocking to White House gymnasiums or boasting about their biceps curls and bench presses.

U.S. cedes its Lend-Lease right to seize Bermuda

Washington

The United States has renounced its right to seize Bermuda in the event of an emergency, in a ceremony in Washington that laid to rest a bargain forged by Sir Winston Churchill in the Second World War.

Under the 1941 Lend-Lease deal, the United States -- then still neutral in the war -- loaned 50 antiquated destroyers to Britain in exchange for 99-year leases on military bases in Bermuda, the West Indies, Newfoundland and British Guiana.

The agreement included a clause giving the U.S. emergency powers to seize the colonies' entire land mass, as well as sea and air territories, to keep them out of Nazi hands if Britain fell to Germany.

The U.S. abandoned the sites seven years ago, but the restoration was held up by wrangling over who would fund a clean-up of oil and other pollution at the former military bases.

Bermuda, which was claimed for the Crown in 1609, is the oldest British colony. Its 63,000 residents rejected independence in a referendum in 1995.

Houseflies can make you sick: Researchers

Anaheim, Calif.

WORLD REPORT

Research has found that flies carry more dangerous pathogens than do cockroaches and laboratory tests have been able to locate the pathogens on common houseflies that cause meningitis and serious food-borne diseases.

Jerry Butler, a University of Florida entomologist, warned that fast-food restaurants' practice of leaving food under heating lamps until the food is sold provides a fertile breeding ground for pathogens transported to food on flies' feet or guts.

More worrying, Butler said, is that houseflies feeding at hospital dumpsters are picking up drug-resistant strains of some bacteria, making treatment of infected humans more difficult. Houseflies can travel 16 km a day and live for about a month.

Pentagon approves patrols for troops in Philippines

Washington

U.S. special forces will step up training of local troops in the Philippines as they prepare to end the largest military counterterror effort outside Afghanistan.

The Pentagon has approved a plan to send Americans on jungle patrol with Philippine soldiers who are fighting Islamic rebels, defence officials said.

While agreeing to the expansion of a counterterror training program, the military rejected the idea of letting Americans stay beyond July.

Clinton Seeks Manufacturing Funds

WASHINGTON (AP)

President Clinton will ask Congress for an additional $386 million for training and trade enforcement programs designed to strengthen U.S. manufacturing jobs, the White House said Friday. The budget request, which will be part of the spending package that Clinton sends to Congress on Monday, comes as he is beginning a major push to convince fellow trade Democrats in Congress to support a new trade arrangement with China. Trade unions are among the most vocal opponents of the proposed pact.

Report: Deutch Still Has Clearance

WASHINGTON (AP)

John Deutch, the former CIA director who was stripped of his agency security clearance, still has Pentagon clearance that allows him to work on classified defense contracts, according to The Washington Post. Deutch's clearance permits him to serve as a paid consultant on Defense Department contracts with the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, SAIC Corp. and Raytheon Corp., the newspaper reported in its Saturday editions.

French Troops Clash With Kosovars

KOSOVSKA MITROVICA, Yugoslavia (AP)

Hundreds of ethnic Albanians pelted French soldiers with stones and bottles Friday, charging that NATO-led peacekeepers failed to prevent the deaths of at least six Kosovo Albanians. The latest round of violence started after a rocket attack Wednesday killed two elderly Serbs on a bus run by the U.N. refugee agency that was carrying them through predominantly Albanian areas near Kosovska Mitrovica. That attack destroyed what little faith minority Serbs had in the power of U.N. peacekeepers to protect them from violence by ethnic Albanians.

Austria Protesters Rally Against Government

through an underground tunnel. President Thomas Klestil, who swore in the new center-right coalition, appealed to the world to give the new government a chance to fulfill its promises to govern under European standards of democracy and human rights.

Noises Heard on Airline 'Black Box'

PORT HUENEME, Calif. (AP)

Two noises were heard on the "black boxes" from Alaska Airlines flight 261 just before the plane crashed in the Pacific ocean, federal officials said. The tape revealed new details of what occurred on the flight in its last minutes as the pilots struggled to control a problem with the horizontal stabilizer the wide part of the tail that keeps a plane flying level. The plane nose-dived into the Pacific Ocean en route from Puerto Vallarta, Mexico, to San Francisco on Monday, killing all 88 aboard.

NASA Listens for Mars Signal

PASADENA, Calif. (AP)

Giant dish antennas in Europe and North America were aimed toward Mars on Friday to begin another attempt to detect what may be a flicker of life from NASA's Mars Polar Lander. It's the largest effort to listen for a signal since Stanford University engineers announced last month that they received an extremely faint signal that could have originated from the $165 million probe. The lander was to have touched down Dec. 3 for a 90-day mission to study the atmosphere and dig for water beneath the surface near Mars' south pole. But it failed to radio its arrival.

Missing Musher Found Alive in Alaska

ANCHORAGE, Alaska (AP)

A rookie sled dog racer who disappeared in blizzard conditions during a 200-mile race was found alive Friday afternoon, six days after he was last seen. Rod Boyce was found near the race trail in the Caribou Hills of the Kenai Peninsula at about 1:30 p.m., said Greg Wilkinson, an Alaska state troopers spokesman. A group of snowmobilers found Boyce and took him to a nearby lodge. Sgt. Jim Hibpshman, commander of the trooper post in Homer, said Boyce refused medical treatment and instead went to the Soldotna airport, where his wife was waiting. "He is tired, hungry, but he's talking and says he's fine," said Hibpshman.

Pacers Defeat Kings 104-94

INDIANAPOLIS (AP)

Mark Jackson had a triple-double and cold-shooting Reggie Miller hit two key jumpers as the Indiana Pacers defeated Sacramento 104-94 Friday night to tie their franchise record of 17 straight home wins. The Pacers won despite losing All-Star forward Dale Davis to a broken nose. He had helped limit Chris Webber to eight points on 4-of-13 shooting until he caught an inadvertent elbow from Nick Anderson with 1:20 left in the half.

US Biological Attack Said Inevitable

SAN DIEGO (AP)

Terrorists will likely attack the United States with the small pox or anthrax viruses within the next five to 10 years, says an expert who warns the country is unprepared. "We are a long way away from being even modestly prepared," D.A. Henderson, director of the Johns Hopkins Center for Civilian Biodefense Studies, said Friday at a conference on bioterrorism. "But we're doing a lot more now than we did 12 months, or even 6 months ago."

Cuban Grandma's Account Stuns Family

MIAMI (AP)

AP Top News at 1 a.m. EST Friday, Feb. 5, 2000

Elian Gonzalez's Miami relatives are outraged over his Cuban grandmother's account of how she playfully bit the 6-year-old boy's tongue and unzipped his pants during their long-awaited reunion. "The family is shocked and disturbed," Armando Gutierrez, spokesman for the Miami relatives, said Friday. "That is not a Cuban custom." Through Sen. Bob Smith, R-N.H., Elian's Florida relatives requested a meeting with Attorney General Janet Reno next week to discuss unspecified new information about the case, Justice spokesman Carole Florman said. The request was being considered.

Lakers Crush the Jazz 113-67

LOS ANGELES (AP)

Shaquille O'Neal and the Los Angeles Lakers limited Utah to only 21 points in the first half and sent the Jazz to their sixth straight loss, 113-67 Friday night. The Jazz just barely managed to avoid their most lopsided defeat ever a 158-102 loss to Milwaukee on March 14, 1979, when they still played in New Orleans. The Lakers' biggest lead was 51 points. O'Neal finished with 25 points. The Lakers led 33-14 after the first quarter and made it 56-21 at halftime.

U.N. Reaches Child Prostitution Accord

GENEVA (AP)

An international accord aimed at combating child prostitution and pornography was finalized by experts from more than 100 countries Friday after more than six years of negotiations. The text is meant to serve as a global framework to standardize national laws against the selling of children for sexual exploitation, for illegal adoption or for use of their organs. The text will now be put to the U.N. Human Rights Commission for approval next month.

Iraqi Demand Puts Funds in Jeopardy

UNITED NATIONS (AP)

Iraq is insisting that the United Nations transfer $50 million directly to its central bank to pay travel expenses for thousands of Iraqis hoping to make the annual Muslim pilgrimage to Saudi Arabia, U.N. diplomats said Friday. The Security Council rejected similar requests for the last two years to give Iraq direct access to funds in a special account used to finance humanitarian activities by selling Iraqi oil. Baghdad's latest demand again threatens to curtail Iraq's participation in the hajj pilgrimage to Mecca and Medina next month.

US Biological Attack Said Inevitable

SAN DIEGO (AP)

Terrorists will likely attack the United States with the small pox or anthrax viruses within the next five to 10 years, says an expert who warns the country is unprepared. "We are a long way away from being even modestly prepared," D.A. Henderson, director of the Johns Hopkins Center for Civilian Biodefense Studies, said Friday at a conference on bioterrorism. "But we're doing a lot more now than we did 12 months, or even 6 months ago."

Cuban Grandma's Account Stuns Family

MIAMI (AP)

Elian Gonzalez's Miami relatives are outraged over his Cuban grandmother's account of how she playfully bit the 6-year-old boy's tongue and unzipped his pants during their long-awaited reunion. "The family is shocked and disturbed," Armando Gutierrez, spokesman for the Miami relatives, said Friday. "That is not a Cuban custom." Through Sen. Bob Smith, R-N.H., Elian's Florida relatives requested a meeting with Attorney General Janet Reno next week to discuss unspecified new information about the case, Justice spokesman Carole Florman said. The request was being considered.

Clinton Seeks Manufacturing Funds

WASHINGTON (AP)

President Clinton will ask Congress for an additional $386 million for training and trade enforcement programs designed to strengthen U.S. manufacturing jobs, the White House said Friday. The budget request, which will be part of the spending package that Clinton sends to Congress on Monday, comes as he is beginning a major push to convince fellow trade Democrats in Congress to support a new trade arrangement with China. Trade unions are among the most vocal opponents of the proposed pact.

Noises Heard on Airline 'Black Box'

PORT HUENEME, Calif. (AP)

Two noises were heard on the "black boxes" from Alaska Airlines flight 261 just before the plane crashed in the Pacific ocean, federal officials said. The tape revealed new details of what occurred on the flight in its last minutes as the pilots struggled to control a problem with the horizontal stabilizer the wide part of the tail that keeps a plane flying level. The plane nose-dived into the Pacific Ocean en route from Puerto Vallarta, Mexico, to San Francisco on Monday, killing all 88 aboard.

Missing Musher Found Alive in Alaska

ANCHORAGE, Alaska (AP)

A rookie sled dog racer who disappeared in blizzard conditions during a 200-mile race was found alive Friday afternoon, six days after he was last seen. Rod Boyce was found near the race trail in the Caribou Hills of the Kenai Peninsula at about 1:30 p.m., said Greg Wilkinson, an Alaska state troopers spokesman. A group of snowmobilers found Boyce and took him to a nearby lodge. Sgt. Jim Hibpshman, commander of the trooper post in Homer, said Boyce refused medical treatment and instead went to the Soldotna airport, where his wife was waiting. "He is tired, hungry, but he's talking and says he's fine," said Hibpshman.

Pistons Defeat Cavaliers 105-96

AUBURN HILLS, Mich. (AP)

Lindsey Hunter had 26 points and 10 assists to lead the Detroit Pistons to a 105-96 victory over the Cleveland Cavaliers on Friday night. Detroit, still playing without the injured Grant Hill, won for just the second time in its last 10 games. Cleveland played without the injured Bobby Sura, then saw Brevin Knight limp off in the second quarter with what appeared to be an ankle injury. Jerry Stackhouse scored 22 points despite a case of the flu, and Terry Mills had 19. Shawn Kemp led Cleveland with 22 points and Lamond Murray scored 19.

VANCOUVER, British Columbia (AP)

Michael Dickerson scored 20 points as Vancouver routed Chicago 101-76 last night, the Grizzlies' most decisive victory in their five-year history. Mike Bibby added 16 points for the Grizzlies, whose biggest previous victory margin was 20 in a 109-89 road victory over the Los Angeles Clippers on Nov. 14. Vancouver also beat the Bulls for the first time in eight career meetings. Chicago, an NBA-worst 9-35, offered little resistance in the middle game of a six-stop road trip. Toni Kukoc led the Bulls with 27 points, and Elton Brand added 22.

U.S.-U.N. Military Ties Resume

UNITED NATIONS (AP)

The U.S. military is resuming high-level contacts with U.N. peacekeeping officials after years of strained relations over the debacle in Somalia and the U.S. failure to pay its U.N. debt. "It is rebuilding a relationship which was severely strained and more or less dried up" in recent years, U.S. Ambassador Richard Holbrooke said in an interview on yesterday. Steve Smith, returning to the city where he starred for five years, scored 21 points and the Portland Trail Blazers couldn't miss in the final five minutes, holding off the Atlanta Hawks 97-90 last night. Jim Jackson, who came to Atlanta along with Isaiah Rider in the trade that sent Smith to Portland before the season, scored 25 points to lead the Hawks.

Egypt Pilot May Have Sought Asylum

CAIRO, Egypt (AP)

An EgyptAir pilot who claims to have information about the deadly crash of Flight 990 in the United States last year reportedly has asked for political asylum in Britain. The official Middle East News Agency carried an EgyptAir statement yesterday quoting the airline's chairman as saying pilot Hamdi Hanafi Taha had asked for asylum. He said Taha claimed to have information on the Oct. 31 crash off Nantucket, Mass., that killed 217 people, the report said. But the statement said Taha "does not have any connection to or knowledge about the cause of the plane crash."

Austria Police, Protestors Clash

VIENNA, Austria (AP)

Clashes overnight between police and protesters in the streets of the capital left more than 50 injured, in demonstrations against a new government that includes a far-right anti-immigration party. Police said today that 43 policemen and 13 protesters were injured, as well as 32 vehicles damaged, in unrest that is rarely seen in this city. Vienna is calm today, but more rallies were planned for the cities of Graz, Salzburg, Bregenz and Steyr.

Clinton Mulls Execution Moratorium

WASHINGTON (AP)

President Clinton is concerned about the issues raised by Illinois' decision to halt executions and said he will consider putting federal executions on hold. The suspension request came in a letter from Sen. Russ Feingold, D-Wis., and is being reviewed by White House counsel, said Clinton spokesman Joe Lockhart. However, he added, there's no guarantee Clinton will act soon.

Falun Gong Members Arrested

BEIJING (AP)

Chinese police tightened security at Tiananmen Square today, after beating and detaining at least 50 members of the banned Falun Gong sect who staged a protest timed for the start of the Lunar New Year. The clashes began at midnight's turn to the New Year, as dozens of Falun Gong members converged on the square under a sky crackling with holiday fireworks. By daybreak, the square reopened but with uniformed and plainclothes police out in force. Their presence apparently thwarted a second protest planned near the Gate of Heavenly Peace where Mao Tse-tung's portrait hangs.

Detained Tanker Heads to Oman

MUSCAT, Oman (AP)

A Russian tanker detained by the U.S. Navy on suspicion it was violating U.N. sanctions against Iraq headed today to Oman, where experts will determine if the oil on board came from Iraq. The ship was seized in the Gulf earlier this week because it was suspected to be carrying Iraqi oil. The United States and Russia have been at loggerheads over the matter after Washington spurned a demand by Moscow that it release the tanker. The vessel, Volga-Neft-147, is expected to arrive late today or early tomorrow in Muscat, the Omani capital.

Loud Noises Recorded Before Crash

PORT HUENEME, Calif. (AP)

Two noises about 10 minutes apart, and loud enough to be heard in the cockpit, could hold the key to why Alaska Airlines Flight 261 suddenly spun out of control and crashed into the Pacific. Investigators aren't speculating about the noises, heard on the plane's cockpit voice recorder. But an aviation safety expert not connected to the probe yesterday said they are consistent with a deteriorating problem in the plane's tail, where pilots had reported a problem with the stabilizer the wide part of the tail that keeps the plane level.

U.S. Mediator Recalled From Mideast

WASHINGTON (AP)

American mediator Dennis B. Ross is leaving the Middle East this weekend without making much headway in peacemaking between Israel and the Palestinians. State Department deputy spokesman James B. Foley went to the region this week to try to spur the two sides toward the outline of a settlement. Among the diplomatic options was to set up a three-way summit in Washington with President Clinton. But last night Foley said "things did not go swimmingly well this week." The next step the administration might take was not clear.

Clinton Proposes Medicaid Coverage

WASHINGTON (AP)

Saying too many poor women lack access to breakthrough cancer treatments, President Clinton today proposed that states provide full Medicaid benefits to uninsured women diagnosed with breast or cervical cancer. In his weekly radio address, the president said his fiscal 2001 budget proposal sets aside $220 million over five years so that states could provide Medicaid coverage to uninsured women who are screened through the National Breast and Cervical Cancer Early Detection Program. The five-year survival rate is 97 percent when the diseases are diagnosed early, but falls to 21 percent after the cancer has spread.

South Africa To Test Kids for HIV

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa (AP)

South Africa's Department of Health said it plans to start testing schoolchildren for HIV in an effort to gauge how quickly the disease is spreading. The tests would be voluntary and require parental permission, the Star newspaper of Johannesburg reported today. Nearly 10 percent of the country's 42 million people are estimated to be infected with the AIDS virus. But so far, HIV surveys have tested only pregnant women, giving an incomplete picture of the epidemic.

Pope Welcomes Indonesian Leader

VATICAN CITY (AP)

Pope John Paul II welcomed Indonesia's reformist president to the Vatican today, warmly greeting the leader who Indonesia's papal nuncio described as "a blessing to his country." The Vatican said Abdurrahman Wahid's talks with church leaders addressed Muslim-Christian relations in Indonesia, where Wahid has sought to calm sectarian violence that killed 2,000 people last year. Wahid and church leaders also discussed the divided island of Timor.

U.S. Mideast envoy Dennis Ross is meeting with both sides to try to bridge the gaps over the location of an Israeli withdrawal from 6.1 percent of the West Bank. A summit between Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak on Thursday ended in sharp disagreement.

Bradley, Gore Sharpen Differences

COLLEGE PARK, Md. (AP)

Bill Bradley, keeping his criticism strong and personal, has accused Democratic rival Al Gore of practicing politics designed to "rip your opponent's lungs out." At a college rally yesterday, Bradley told about 500 students that he will continue to underscore his differences with Gore as the two head into the big round of primary elections March 7. Gore's spokesman said Bradley's daily comments are sounding more and more like the Republicans' "standard attack lines."

The United States moved within a loss of first-round elimination in the Davis Cup when Zimbabwe's Wayne Black and Kevin Ullyett beat Rick Leach and Alex O'Brien 7-6 (4), 5-7, 0-6, 7-5, 7-5 today. Zimbabwe, which got a split in yesterday's singles, needs only one win in tomorrow's reverse singles to eliminate the Americans. The United States needs victories by both Andre Agassi and Chris Woodruff tomorrow to advance.

Delaware Dems Hold No-Stakes Contest

WILMINGTON, Del. (AP)

Delaware Democrats are choosing between Al Gore and Bill Bradley today in a no-stakes presidential primary so neglected by both sides that volunteers had to buy their own campaign buttons. The two national campaigns said they would get serious when Delaware does and begins choosing its presidential nominating delegates in party caucuses late next month. The primary was scheduled near the start of the campaign season in an effort to gain influence in the nominating contest, but Democrats could not select their 22 delegates this soon without violating party rules.

This season, Barkley, considered a top NBA prospect, is averaging 16.9 points, 4.1 assists and 2.6 rebounds in 17 games.

Alaska Air Relatives Gather

PORT HUENEME, Calif. (AP)

Relatives and friends of the 88 victims of Alaska Airlines Flight 261 are gathering today to honor and remember their loved ones. Prior to the service dozens of surfers, holding hands, paddled out into the chilly Pacific waters and left three flower wreaths near the site of last week's crash. Investigators, meanwhile, continue to seek clues to what brought the aircraft down. Two noises about 10 minutes apart, and loud enough to be heard in the cockpit, could hold the key to why Alaska Airlines Flight 261 suddenly spun out of control and crashed into the Pacific.

IRA Says It Will Not Disarm

BELFAST, Northern Ireland (AP)

The Irish Republican Army said today it will not disarm in response to British government or Protestant demands and emphasized that it had never pledged to give up its arms at all. The outlawed group's statement leaves the centerpiece of Northern Ireland's peace accord, the Protestant-Catholic government, in continued peril. Britain says it will strip the 9-week-old coalition Cabinet of its powers on Friday if the IRA doesn't promise to disarm. The Cabinet's senior Catholic politician, Seamus Mallon, today called the Sinn Fein-IRA position deliberately misleading.

President Clinton proposed today helping states eliminate the barriers poor women face in fighting breast or cervical cancer, saying he wants them to have access to the "medical miracles of our time." Clinton is seeking a $220 million, five-year program, to allow states to provide full Medicaid benefits to women whose cancers are detected through federally funded screening programs.

Zimbabwe Beats U.S. for 2-1 Lead

HARARE, Zimbabwe (AP)

Zimbabwe stunned the U.S. Davis Cup team by taking a 2-1 lead with a grueling doubles victory today, leaving John McEnroe's Americans within a game of a first-round elimination. "We're going to fight to the last drop," said captain McEnroe who isn't playing although he dearly wishes he were who must urge Andre Agassi and newcomer Chris Woodruff on to victory. If either player loses tomorrow, the Americans are out of the competition.

Russia Bombs Chechen Villages

ALKHAN-KALA, Russia (AP)

Going after rebels who broke out of the Chechen capital, Russian forces bombed and shelled Chechnya's western villages Saturday in an assault residents said was largely causing civilian casualties. Militants say many of the 3,000 rebels who have filtered through the Russian blockade of Grozny since Monday are moving south, toward the breakaway republic's rugged mountains, where thousands of their comrades are concentrated. The rebels insist their retreat from Grozny strengthened their position by freeing them from the Russian blockade and allowing them more mobility to wage a guerrilla war.

Poll: McCain, Bush Tied in S.C.

WASHINGTON (AP)

Coming off a resounding victory in New Hampshire, John McCain has rallied from a 20-percentage point deficit in South Carolina and now is in statistical draw with George W. Bush, said a Time/CNN poll released today. Nationally, a Newsweek poll showed a major surge by McCain but found he still was far behind the Texas governor.

AP Top News at 1 a.m. EST Friday, Feb. 5, 2000

The latest poll found McCain the choice of 44 percent of likely Republican voters in the Feb. 19 primary, compared with Bush's 40 percent. Given the poll's 4.5 percent margin of error, the race is statistically even.

Service Held for Alaska Air Victims

MALIBU, Calif. (AP)

As the Navy continues to map the underwater wreckage of Alaska Airlines Flight 261, relatives and friends of those who died aboard the aircraft gathered today for a memorial service at a seaside campus. The National Transportation Safety Board had indicated the work was proceeding rapidly, thanks to calm seas and a debris area only about the size of a football field. The work is expected to be completed over the weekend. Two noises about 10 minutes apart, and loud enough to be heard in the cockpit, could hold the key to why the jetliner spun out of control and crashed into the Pacific.

Haider Tries To Reassure Austrians

VIENNA, Austria (AP)

In an effort to quell fears of international isolation, right-wing leader Joerg Haider told a deeply divided Austrian public Saturday that the new governing coalition that includes his Freedom Party would soon prove its democratic credentials to the world. Haider called the European Union's action in freezing high-level contacts with the new government "irrelevant." Haider's history of remarks against immigration and sympathetic remarks about aspects of Nazi rule led other nations to warn against his party's inclusion in the government.

Chinese Celebrate Lucky Dragon Year

TAIPEI, Taiwan (AP)

One of the luckiest years in the 12-year Chinese zodiac the Dragon Year was welcomed Saturday in Taiwanese temples, where eye-stinging clouds of incense wafted through the air. Chinese in major cities throughout Asia celebrated the Lunar New Year with crackling fireworks, dragon dances, acrobats and parades. Throughout the day, thousands of celebrants carrying incense sticks and plates of oranges, sticky rice cakes and other offerings shuffled into the smoky Hsingtien Temple in northwest Taipei.

US Increases Role in Mideast Talks

JERUSALEM (AP)

The United States stepped into a dispute between Israel and the Palestinians on Saturday, amid hints from the Palestinians that the crisis could suspend or even halt peace negotiations. U.S. Mideast envoy Dennis Ross is meeting with officials from both sides to try to bridge the gaps over the location of an Israeli withdrawal from 6.1 percent of the West Bank. Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat, describing an "unprecedented crisis," sent envoys to consult with officials in Jordan and Egypt.

AP Top News at 1 a.m. EST Friday, Feb. 5, 2000

Charlie Bell opened each half with a 3-pointer and Michigan State rolled to an 85-66 win over Connecticut today in a battle between two of last season's Final Four teams. It was a school-record 24th straight home win for the No. 8 Spartans (17-5), breaking a mark set during the early 1930s and matched during the mid-1960s. The loss snapped a three-game winning streak for seventh-ranked UConn (16-5), the Big East powerhouse which is 11-2 in nonconference games. The Huskies' other nonconference loss was to Iowa, another Big Ten team.

French, Kosovars Clash Again

KOSOVSKA MITROVICA, Yugoslavia (AP)

French peacekeepers clashed with ethnic Albanians in northwestern Kosovo on Saturday, using clubs and tear gas to force back hundreds who tried to push their way across a bridge to the Serb-controlled side of a divided town. It was the second straight day of confrontations between peacekeeping troops and ethnic Albanians in Kosovska Mitrovica, and the fourth day of violence since a rocket attack on a U.N. bus killed two elderly Serbs. Forty-one people, including 11 French soldiers, were injured in Saturday's clash.

U.S. Confirms SEALs Boarded Tanker

MUNICH, Germany (AP)

A Russian tanker detained in the Gulf of Oman on suspicion of carrying Iraqi oil ignored U.S. Navy demands that it stop, so armed Navy SEALs were dispatched by helicopter to board and seize the vessel, a Pentagon official said today. Kenneth Bacon, chief spokesman for Defense Secretary William Cohen, confirmed a published report that a team of 10 commandos descended ropes from a helicopter hovering above the suspect tanker. U.S. officials have said the Russian crew offered no resistance to being boarded Wednesday and cooperated with U.S. Navy personnel involved.

NANTES, France (AP)

About 20,000 demonstrators gathered in the northwest French city of Nantes on Saturday to show their anger over a two-month-old oil spill that has contaminated the country's Atlantic coastline. The ecological damage occurred after the Maltese-registered "Erika" tanker split in two in rough waters Dec. 12, spilling 3 million gallons of heavy oil. The chairman of the Franco-Belgian oil company TotalFina, which chartered the tanker, was a frequent target of the crowd's shouts and slogans. TotalFina Chairman Thierry Desmarest has said the company would spend about $108 million to clean the coasts.

Hezbollah Threatens Attack on Israel

BEIRUT, Lebanon (AP)

Hezbollah's leader threatened Saturday to fire rockets at Israel in retaliation for Israeli airstrikes on a southern Lebanon village that wounded eight people. Sheik Hassan Nasrallah called on his guerrillas to "be prepared and ready your Katyushas (rockets), because what happened yesterday calls for retaliation, and we will retaliate at the appropriate time." An Israeli strike on Barish village was an apparent attempt to assassinate an unidentified guerrilla commander. A rocket hit the guerrilla commander's car, injuring him. Another struck a house, wounding seven civilians.

British authorities are considering an asylum plea from an EgyptAir pilot who claims to have information about the airline's fatal crash last year off the coast of Massachusetts, officials said Saturday. The Egyptian government has condemned as outrageous the theory that the plane was brought down deliberately by a co-pilot who died in the crash. If Hamdi Hanafi Taha, 49, has information that counters the official Egyptian stance, he may fear being ostracized or worse in a country where human rights activists have been jailed for speech considered harmful to the national interest.

WASHINGTON (AP)

AP Top News at 1 a.m. EST Friday, Feb. 5, 2000

Americans are increasingly turning to cable television and the Internet rather than newspapers and network TV for information about the presidential campaign, according to a poll out today. "The dominant news sources of years gone by are no longer so dominant," said Andrew Kohut, director of the Pew Research Center for the People & the Press. The January poll showed that while three-fourths of the public still get most of their campaign news from television, viewers have migrated away from the networks since the last presidential election. Only 24 percent of the public cited network television as their main election news source, compared with 39 percent in April 1996.

Austrians Remain Worried, Defiant

VIENNA, Austria (AP)

With sanctions from abroad and riots at home, Austria has seen dramatic change since Friday, when Joerg Haider's anti-immigrant party became half of the government. Average Austrians remain alternately worried and defiant, their national pride replaced by anxiety as governments reduce relations or withdraw ambassadors and foreign tourists begin canceling trips. Haider's party stepped in as the advocate of the little people, attacking the ruling parties and their leaders. The Freedom Party narrowly outpolled the People's Party, setting the stage for the months of torturous negotiations that ended with Haider's party sharing power.

As mourners left a memorial service today honoring the victims of Alaska Airlines Flight 261, 88 white doves one for each crash victim were released into the sky. "All of California aches with you," Gov. Gray Davis told the mourners gathered at Pepperdine University's oceanside campus. Earlier in the day, dozens of surfers paddled out into the chilly Pacific waters to drop three flower wreaths near the site where the airplane crashed on Monday, killing everyone aboard. The plane was headed from Puerto Vallarta, Mexico to San Francisco and then Seattle.

Gore Wins Delaware Straw Poll

WILMINGTON, Del. (AP)

Vice President Al Gore won comfortably the Delaware presidential primary that was only a popularity contest, a state-run straw poll. The vice president captured 57 percent of the vote, the former senator from New Jersey, 40 percent. "We hope to also earn that support caucus day," said spokesman Chris Lehane. That will be March 27, when Delaware Democrats begin choosing their 22 nominating delegates. The state scheduled its primary near the start of the campaign season in an effort to gain influence, but Democrats could not select delegates this soon without violating party rules.

Reserve David Shelton scored 20 of his season-high 24 points in the first half as No. 17 Tulsa built a 30-point lead on the way to beating Texas Christian 103-70 in the Western Athletic Conference tonight. Tulsa (22-2 overall, 7-1 WAC) shot 55.2 percent and outrebounded the Horned Frogs (13-11, 4-4) 45-27. TCU, the nation's highest-scoring team at 90.9 points a game, shot only 34.5 percent (19-of-55) and committed 20 turnovers.

Poll: McCain, Bush Tied in S.C.

WASHINGTON (AP)

Rallying from a 20-percentage point deficit in South Carolina, John McCain is now in a statistical draw with George W. Bush, said a Time/CNN poll released today. Nationally, a Newsweek poll showed a major surge by McCain after a resounding victory in New Hampshire, but found he still was far behind the Texas governor. The latest poll found McCain the choice of 44 percent of likely Republican voters in the Feb. 19 primary, compared with Bush's 40 percent. Given the poll's 4.5 percent margin of error, the race is statistically even.

Time moves swiftly in Ireland these days. Five years ago Roddy Doyle caused an uproar with a hard-hitting television series called "Family" that portrayed domestic violence and alcoholism among the Irish working classes. "Even my old teachers' union complained that I had a teacher striking a child," he recalled. "But I'm fairly convinced that if 'Family' were broadcast tonight, it wouldn't cause half the fuss that it did in 1994."

The proof may be Mr. Doyle's acclaimed new novel, "A Star Called Henry" (Viking). In it he has done no less than dismantle some of the founding myths of 20th-century Irish nationalism. And so far he has heard nothing but praise for it here.

"I did expect at least one person to stand up and object," he said softly. "But there seems to be a self-confidence that wasn't there in the past. A lot of the old statues have come tumbling down."

Mr. Doyle, 41, has now knocked down a few more, not least that Ireland was actually a better place after its war of independence against Britain led to creation of the Irish Free State in 1921. Yet in the newly prosperous Ireland of the 1990's such a notion is no longer treasonable. Money, rather than memory, is the new Irish obsession. And with the present breaking free at last from the past, history is now available to become raw material for Mr. Doyle's fiction.

The novel, described as Volume I of a trilogy called "The Last Roundup," follows Henry Smart's first-person account from his birth in a Dublin slum in 1901 to an alcoholic mother and a one-legged bouncer-cum-murderer father, until 1921. His early years are miserable as he lives on the streets with his younger brother. As a teen-ager he joins the Citizen Army and helps seize the General Post Office during the abortive 1916 Easter Rising. The rebel leader Michael Collins then has him bumping off traitors and training young revolutionaries. But when the war ends, Henry feels betrayed by the Irishmen who have seized power. His own life now threatened, he leaves Dublin for Liverpool.

For Mr. Doyle, who cuts a distinctive figure with his shaven head, wire-rimmed glasses and pierced left ear lobe, the book marks a dramatic change from his narrative close-ups of the past. He made his name in the 1980's with his

THE CREATIVE MIND: Chipping Away the Blarney; Ireland Lauds a Novelist Who Dismantles National Myths

Barrytown trilogy -- "The Commitments," "The Snapper" and "The Van" -- affectionate and humorous looks at working-class life in a Dublin suburb that were all made into movies.

His next novel, "Paddy Clarke Ha Ha Ha," which won Britain's Booker Prize in 1993, is a 10-year-old boy's account of his parents' crumbling marriage. Two years later, in "The Woman Who Walked Into Doors," the narrator tells of her struggle to rebuild her life after a violent marriage.

Now, variously inspired by Charles Dickens, Peter Carey, Gunter Grass and Salman Rushdie, Mr. Doyle is reaching out to embrace a nation's history through the best part of a century. If things go according to plan, the second volume of "The Last Roundup" will follow Henry Smart to the United States to live the Irish immigrant experience, while the third installment will return him to a different Ireland.

"Gradually, in the writing and the planning, the big history began to become real and big to me," Mr. Doyle said in an interview. "At first I saw Henry as a bit of a liar, chancing his arm through the 20th century, claiming he'd done things and seen things. But when I started describing his childhood, the lying element became less important. Although it's not exactly realistic, I felt that essentially Henry is telling the truth."

And yet, like that of many of his generation, Mr. Doyle's knowledge of Irish history was anything but reliable. At primary school, he recalled, the distinction between legendary and mythical figures like St. Patrick and "the real lads who came later" was blurred. When the "troubles" began in Northern Ireland in the 1970's, with Mr. Doyle now in a high school run by the Christian Brothers, the passions of the war of independence returned, with the Irish Republican Army again the heroes. "Then the heirs to the idealism of 1916 started planting bombs in restaurants and pubs in Belfast," he said, "and suddenly history disappeared."

So he had to do his own digging. At the end of "A Star Called Henry" Mr. Doyle lists a score or more books whose authors he thanks for "the information, ideas, images, phrases, maps, photographs and song lyrics" that helped him in his writing, not only in understanding the early Republican movement and its assorted socialist and nationalist factions and in portraying figures like Collins, James Connolly, Padraic Pearse and Eamon de Valera, but also in getting a feel for slum life in Dublin at the turn of the century.

One book in particular, "Dublin Tenement Life: An Oral History" by Kevin C. Kearns, proved invaluable. From it Mr. Doyle learned that many working-class women were known as "shawlies," for the shawls they wore. He discovered that rat catchers would make a "soup" of baby rats that they rubbed on their arms to bring rats rushing out of their hiding places.

And most crucially he was reminded of the popular belief that dead babies became stars. In the title of Mr. Doyle's book, the "star" is Henry's dead brother, whose name he was given and whose star he learned to identify.

A book of maps provided Mr. Doyle with a key to the myriad rivers flowing beneath Dublin, rivers where Henry's father dumped bits of the bodies of his victims, rivers that his wooden leg (which Henry inherited as a lethal weapon) could divine from street level, and rivers that Henry himself used for escaping from trouble. This being fiction, though, Mr. Doyle excused himself from actually exploring subterranean Dublin.

"I read as I wrote," he recalled of his three years' work on this book. "I have always done that when I have done research. I wouldn't have the ability or the mind to read for a year and then sit down and write. I have to work away. I read for verification or for a new idea. But if I have always tried to be realistic until now. This time I was quite happy that the reality be seen in a distorted sort of way." Certainly not every narrator remembers his birth, as Henry Smart does. Not every hero is 6 feet 2 inches tall and irresistibly handsome at age 14. Not every young lover carries "two nipple-made pockmarks" on his forehead as a trophy. No wonder more than one critic has noted the "magic realism" in this book.

"Historical novels run a constant risk of lurching into costume drama," Roy Foster wrote in The Guardian of London. "Doyle, however, avoids creaky verismo by using a carefully gauged admixture of magic-realist techniques."

THE CREATIVE MIND: Chipping Away the Blarney; Ireland Lauds a Novelist Who Dismantles National Myths

Mr. Doyle said he suspected that someone would bring up "magic realism," although he confessed that he did know exactly what it meant.

"I am a fairly well-read person, but not in terms of magic realism," he said. "The nipple indentations were just part of the fun. It was a joke that I can reintroduce if I feel like on page 732 of the next volume, when everyone has forgotten about the marks on Henry's forehead."

On the other hand, Ivan Reynolds, the character in this book who comes to personify the post-1921 Ireland, is fictional but all too real because, as Mr. Doyle puts it, "he represents the men on the make, the men 'whose time has come,' as they described themselves."

Recruited into the revolution by Henry, Ivan has become a corrupt rural warlord by 1921, when he tells the disillusioned Henry what the fighting was all about. "It wasn't Ireland," he explains. "Ireland's an island, Captain, a dollop of muck. It's about control of the island, that's what the soldiering's about, not the harps and the martyrs and the freedom to swing a hurly. Am I right, d'you think?"

Mr. Doyle would appear to agree, at least, that things turned out that way, that for decades after 1921, as Ireland wallowed in poverty and its sons and daughters emigrated in search of jobs, politics here became an extension of the civil war that erupted among the Irish once the British had left, about control of the island. And these lines remained drawn, more through tradition than conviction, until the Ireland of the 1990's discovered that there was an alternative.

"I think maybe that now the old preconceptions have been rattled in the last five or six years, there's a generosity that wasn't there before," Mr. Doyle said. "There's a genuine curiosity about what went on. People have asked me, how will anyone outside Ireland understand the book? To be honest, people in their 20's and 30's in Ireland will have as much difficulty in some ways because that part of our history was bypassed."

Some Irish critics see the book as accelerating Ireland's process of understanding itself. "It exposes each of the ideological underpinnings on which the state rests and then demolishes each in turn," Carlo Gebler wrote in The Irish Times. "In other, less forgiving climes (say, the Soviet Union), Doyle would be put on a cattle truck and sent away. Forever. There is no higher praise, I believe, than to say a book is that dangerous."

Ireland, though, seems to be just as pleased to celebrate yet another Irish writer whose work is applauded abroad, with Irish officialdom happy to point to this country's booming arts as further evidence that something new is afoot here. But Mr. Doyle still sounds a tad skeptical.

"There's a staggering amount of quality writing being done here now," he said, "But it seems we're always trying to live up to some sort of image. The ol' Paddy dancing at the crossroads has just been replaced by a sexier version."

Air Canada agent pleads guilty to air miles scam

London

A former check-in agent working for Air Canada has pleaded guilty to an air miles scam that allowed him and others to fly first-class around the world.

Satbal Singh, 24, pleaded guilty to charges of false accounting, obtaining services by deception and obtaining property by deception in a London court on Monday. A police spokesman could not say Tuesday what punishment Singh faces when he returns to court May 21 for sentencing.

In a news release, Britain's National Crime Squad said Singh credited phoney accounts he set up for himself with the air miles points of passengers he checked in while working for Air Canada at Heathrow Airport.

He fraudulently collected five million air miles in accounts with a variety of airlines.

2 children stabbed to death in Connecticut

New London, Conn.

A man seriously wounded his ex-girlfriend and stabbed their toddler son and the woman's 10-year-old sister to death early Tuesday before wounding himself, authorities said.

A neighbour who sheltered the ex-girlfriend also suffered stab wounds, authorities said.

The two children, 15-month-old Josiah Swain and his 10-year-old aunt, Emmaline Turner, were killed at a public housing complex, Deputy Police Chief William Gavitt said.

The suspect, Robert Swain III, 23, was being treated for what appeared to be two self-inflicted superficial stab wounds to the chest, authorities said. Swain, the boy's father, was to be arraigned on two counts of capital felony, which carry a possible death sentence, Gavitt said.

Swain's 20-year-old ex-girlfriend, Jennifer Turner and a neighbour, Rita Whitehead, were also stabbed.

Police said the attack began with an argument between Swain and Turner.

If elected, Labour vows vote on dumping Queen

Sydney, Australia;

Republicans on Tuesday welcomed a pledge by the opposition Labour party leader to allow Australia to vote again on whether to dump the Queen as its head of state if he wins office in federal elections.

A Labour government would hold a plebiscite -- a nonbinding, national vote -- to test the country's readiness to become a republic within 12 months of taking office, said opposition leader Mark Latham, in comments to a forum due to be broadcast later Tuesday.

"We'd want to get that done in our first term, so have the first plebiscite, then the second and then by the time of the following election would be good timing for a constitutional referendum," Latham told the voters' forum late Monday in Sydney.

National elections are expected to take place later this year.

His timetable would allow Australia to become a republic by 2007.

Haiti calls off recruitment after academy stampede

Port-Au-Prince, Haiti

Police fired tear gas and U.S. marines blocked the entrance of the police academy in the Haitian capital Tuesday as hundreds of candidates stormed the building during a recruiting drive.

The police used batons to beat back recruits and called off the recruiting drive after several people reportedly were injured in the incident.

Haiti's interim government began the drive Monday in an effort to replenish the country's depleted police force. Hundreds of officers, fearing reprisal attacks because of their loyalties to ousted president Jean-Bertrand Aristide, fled their posts when rebels launched an armed rebellion that ousted Aristide on Feb. 29.

The government fired 150 of the former officers last week for leaving their posts or for ethics violations. Dozens more have fled the country.

Tree crashes onto car, couple dies, baby survives

Hastings-On-Hudson, N.Y.

A large tree fell onto a parkway and hit two cars, killing a couple and injuring their baby daughter, police said.

The tree fell across all four lanes of the Saw Mill River Parkway north of New York City on Monday evening and smashed onto the back of a sport utility vehicle, rolling it over onto the shoulder where it came to rest on its roof.

The driver, Stephen Spruck, 27 and his wife, Suzana Dedivanaj-Spruck, 31, were killed. But six-month-old Kristina Spruck had been strapped into a safety seat in the back and was rescued by police and firefighters.

She was in fair condition in hospital Monday night, said police spokesman Sgt. Bruce Bellom. A call seeking an update Tuesday was not returned.

The tree also hit a second car but the driver was not seriously injured. She said she was stunned because the weather seemed fine.

Sinn Fein to face financial penalty over IRA violence

London

WORLD REPORT

The Sinn Fein party will lose its British government funding because of a new report confirming that the Irish Republican Army remains deeply involved in violence, Britain announced Tuesday.

The announcement came as the government published an expert report on the Northern Ireland activities of outlawed paramilitary groups.

"I hope this report and the firm but carefully measured action the government is taking in response to it, will underline it is essential that all paramilitary activity, from whatever quarter, should cease fully and completely," Northern Ireland Secretary Paul Murphy told the House of Commons.

The report by the four-member Independent Monitoring Commission concluded that some Sinn Fein leaders were also influential IRA commanders who should bear responsibility for the IRA's continuing violence and preparations for potential wider violence.

Aboriginal woman puts curse on Australian PM

Colac, Australia

An Aboriginal woman clad in face paint and possum skins pointed a small bone at Australian Prime Minister John Howard on Tuesday in what appeared to be an attempt to curse him in retaliation for his plan to disband the country's top panel on indigenous affairs.

The woman, known only as Moopor, was part of a group of Aborigines protesting Howard's decision to eliminate the Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Commission, an elected body meant to allow indigenous people to run their own affairs.

The woman pointed the bone at the prime minister while he climbed into a waiting car. Howard was in the outback town of Colac in the state of Victoria after visiting about 500 members of a local community.

The prime minister, apparently oblivious to any hex, smiled and waved at the woman.

Russian bid for year-long space station stay rejected

Cape Canaveral, Fla.

NASA has turned down a Russian request for astronauts to spend a full year aboard the International Space Station, saying it lacks the medical know-how for such excessively long stints.

The Russian Space Agency wanted to extend a future mission from six to 12 months, so it could fill the seats on the ferrying capsule with tourists or other paying customers who would spend a week at the station.

A Russian Soyuz capsule is launched to the station every six months and the two seats that would have been taken by replacement crew could have been sold.

Americans have spent no more than 6 1/2 months at a time in space, while a handful of Russian cosmonauts have flown a year or more.

The world space endurance record, held by a cosmonaut, is 14 1/2 months.

Afghan leader announces shakeup, cabinet size cut

Kabul

Afghan President Hamid Karzai said Tuesday that he has ordered a reduction in the size of his cabinet and a clarification of the responsibilities of each ministry, a shakeup that could create resentment among the country's fractious ethnic and regional groups.

WORLD REPORT

Karzai made the announcement at the opening of a three-day gathering of representatives of international donor countries in the capital, Kabul.

"I have come to the conclusion that the size of the cabinet is too large," Karzai told the gathering. He said that Vice-President Hedayat Amin Arsala and two ministers would come back with recommendations in two weeks on how to pare it down.

He also announced plans to overhaul the system of selecting sub-cabinet level posts in an effort to make them more transparent.

L.A. airport hit with 2nd power outage in 8 days

Los Angeles

Los Angeles International Airport suffered its second power outage in eight days, although flights were not disrupted thanks to backup batteries.

A malfunctioning transformer was blamed for leaving some airport buildings without regular electricity for nearly two hours Monday. The cause of the electricity problems wasn't known.

"It's a little disturbing," said Bob Marks, regional vice-president of the National Air Traffic Controllers Association. "This sure seems like a fragile power infrastructure."

The airport's April 12 power failure lasted less than a second, but caused radar and communications systems at the control tower to malfunction and forced dozens of planes to be delayed. Officials suspect a bird landing on a wire was the cause.

Violence mars first day of voting in Indian election

New Delhi

Indians braved attacks by separatists and communists as they started voting Tuesday in Parliament elections expected to return Prime Minister Atal Bihari Vajpayee to power for another five years.

At least 11 people were killed and 18 injured in election-day violence.

The massive polls in the world's largest democracy, with more than 660 million registered voters, will be staggered in five phases over three weeks ending May 10, with vote-counting starting three days later.

Militants opposed to India's control over portions of Kashmir were blamed for fatally shooting a paramilitary soldier guarding a polling station and a separate bomb attack in the region that wounded six civilians, including two poll workers.

A car filled with Indian journalists and human rights activists on their way to monitor polling stations exploded when it ran over a land mine in Kashmir. Two died and four others were wounded.

Maoist rebels have ordered an election boycott in the isolated northeastern states of Jharkhand and Bihar.

Gorillas adjusting to new home in South Africa zoo

Johannesburg, South Africa

Four young African gorillas, captured illegally and held at a Malaysian zoo, are adjusting well to their new home at the Pretoria National Zoological Gardens, officials said Monday.

Animal activists, however, said the gorillas would be better off at a sanctuary in the West African country of Cameroon, where poachers are believed to have caught them.

WORLD REPORT

After six weeks' quarantine, the gorillas, one male and three females about three or four years old, will be transferred to the zoo's gorilla enclosure, which is being refurbished to a "state of the art" exhibition centre, said Willie Labuschagne, the zoo's executive director.

Pretoria has one other gorilla, a male named Hobbit who is nearly 30 years old.

Despite the zoo's improvements, the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals said the apes should be returned to Cameroon, as that country's government demands.

Subway line construction causes highway collapse

Singapore

Excavation for a new subway line caused a section of highway to collapse along Singapore's eastern coast, killing one person and leaving three others missing, authorities said.

An underground explosion was believed to have caused the collapse at around 3:30 p.m. local time during construction of the $1.12 billion subway line, police and transport authorities said.

It wasn't immediately clear what caused the explosion but police said the incident did not appear to have been terrorist-related.

"We have no evidence to believe that this is sabotage," a police statement said.

Rescue workers recovered one body, Singapore Civil Defence Force spokesman Abdul Razak said. He did not identify the person.

Powell admits to doubts over case for war in Iraq

London.

Doubts over the Iraq war emerged at the heart of the Bush administration Tuesday when Colin Powell, the U.S. secretary of state, suggested that he might not have supported the conflict had he known Saddam Hussein lacked stockpiles of deadly weapons.

Though hedged with careful expressions of support for President George W. Bush, Powell's comments were aimed at the hawks who pressed for war over his calls for diplomacy to be given more time.

His intervention was embarrassing for British Prime Minister Tony Blair who Tuesday set up a tightly drawn inquiry into the reliability of prewar intelligence on Iraq's WMD. The inquiry will not be able to question his decision to take the country to war.

Compiled from Star News Services

Blair continues to say he has no regrets over the conflict. The inquiry, to be led by Lord Butler of Brockwell, a former cabinet secretary, could not reopen the argument over whether the war was right or wrong -- that had been a decision for the government and parliament.

French premier urges ban on Islamic head scarves

Paris

French Premier Jean-Pierre Raffarin urged legislators Tuesday to ban Islamic head scarves and other conspicuous religious apparel in public schools, saying France must set clear limits in the face of growing militancy.

The measure also bans Jewish skullcaps and large Christian crosses from public schools, but French authorities have made clear it is aimed at Muslim head coverings. There is growing concern that Muslims are not integrating into French society -- a concern magnified by fears of a rise in Muslim fundamentalism.

"Certain religious signs ... are multiplying in our schools," he said, adding that such signs "take on a political sense and cannot be considered a religious sign. "I say with force, religion must not be a political project."

Talks to revive deal on power sharing resume

WORLD REPORT

Belfast, Northern Ireland

Northern Ireland's political enemies gathered around the same table Tuesday to begin discussing the possible revival of a joint Catholic-Protestant administration, the central goal of the 1998 peace accord.

Britain and Ireland hope that the coming three months of negotiations that have been scheduled will somehow resurrect power-sharing. But their task appears daunting given the recent electoral triumph of extremist forces in Northern Ireland politics: the Democratic Unionists on the British Protestant side of the fence and Sinn Fein on the Irish Catholic side.

And Democratic Unionist leader Ian Paisley declared as he exited Stormont Parliamentary Building that his party would not negotiate with Sin Fein, which is linked to the Irish Republican Army. His negotiating team did break new ground by sitting, for the first time, at the same negotiating table as Sinn Fein.

EU tells Romanians to halt 'export' of children

Brussels

The European Commission has warned Romania to halt the export of children for adoption or face a bar on EU membership and the severance of aid funds.

The commission wrote to Adrian Nastase, the prime minister, warning that his government's conduct failed to meet the "political criteria" on human rights required for EU accession. Romania is hoping to join in 2007.

The unprecedented letter, signed by the enlargement commissioner Gunther Verheugen, not only threatened to cut off aid, it also referred to the need for a "recovery of funds" already spent unless Bucharest can account for its actions. Officials say about $90 million Cdn in aid is at risk.

The mounting dispute comes after reports in the Italian press that Romania has sent 105 children to Italy on dubious pretexts, confirming suspicions in Brussels that the Nastase government is turning a blind eye to large-scale racketeering by adoption agencies and corrupt officials.

Topless barber shop in Paisley condemned

Edinburgh.

A topless barber's shop was condemned Tuesday as an appalling example of the loutish culture sweeping Britain.

The proposed hairdresser, in which all the female staff will be over 18 and topless, is due to open in Paisley, Scotland and the local authority says there is nothing it can do to stop it.

It will take the place of another controversial shop called Bongheads in the centre of Paisley, which sold cannabis seeds, drugs paraphernalia and sex toys.

Sandra White, a Scottish National Party MSP and a member of a cross-party group on violence against women, said she was disgusted by this "laddish culture" and would picket the shop.

But Kenny Campbell, 23, a postman, supported the proposal. "Going to the barber's can be a bit dull, but topless women would certainly liven things up. People would be queuing at the door. I think I could be getting a trim every couple of days."

Car bomb explodes near market in south Russia

Vladikavkaz, Russia

A car bomb exploded Tuesday evening near the central market in Vladikavkaz, a southern Russian city near the war-racked republic of Chechnya, killing two people and injuring up to 10.

WORLD REPORT

Heavy smoke filled the area as firefighters battled flames after the explosion. Glass in many of the nearby two-storey buildings was shattered by the bomb, which officials said had a force equivalent to six or seven kg of TNT.

Regional interior ministry spokesman Ismel Shaov said the dead included one civilian and one serviceman and that six other people had been admitted to hospital, including a mother and father and their two-year-old daughter.

European scientists plan Mars missions to rival U.S.

London

European scientists set out plans Tuesday for manned missions to Mars that aim to land astronauts on the red planet within 30 years.

Like U.S. President George W. Bush's proposed mission to Mars, the outline put forward by the European Space Agency involves a "stepping-stone" approach that includes robotic missions and a manned trip to the moon first.

"We need to go back to the moon before we go to Mars. We need to walk before we run," said Dr. Franco Ongaro, who heads the ESA's Aurora program for exploration of the solar system.

The ESA has planned two flagship missions to Mars -- ExoMars would land a rover on the planet in 2009 and Mars Sample Return would bring back a sample of the Martian surface in 2011 to 2014.

More than 40 feared drowned in boat mishap

Kampala, Uganda

A boat overloaded with passengers and cargo capsized in stormy weather on a lake in western Uganda and more than 40 people were feared drowned, police said Tuesday.

So far, 37 of the more than 80 passengers have have been rescued and 19 bodies recovered from the waters of Lake Albert, where the large dugout canoe with an outboard engine overturned early Monday, said Grace Turyagum, the region's police commander. The rest are feared dead.

The accident took place just south of Panyimur, a village 280 km west of Kampala, he said.

Nigerians decry old AIDS drugs, scarcity, corruption

Lagos, Nigeria

AIDS activists complained Tuesday that a Nigerian government plan to provide cheap AIDS drugs had failed, threatening the lives of more than 14,000 HIV-infected people who began taking the drugs two years ago -- only to be told that the supply has run out.

A top health official in Nigeria -- one of Africa's top-five HIV-infected nations -- acknowledged that the AIDS program had exhausted its medication, but said the government has ordered more.

Nigeria's main organization of people with the virus, AIDS Alliance Nigeria, faulted the government for its overall handling of the project.

Repeated shortages, dispensing of expired drugs and corruption have marred what should have been a laudable program, activists said.

North Korea agrees to resume nuclear talks

Seoul, South Korea

WORLD REPORT

North Korea agreed Tuesday to resume six-country talks Feb. 25 -- a breakthrough in U.S.-led efforts to persuade the Communist state to abandon its nuclear weapons programs for economic and other concessions from Washington.

The new round of talks, to begin in Beijing, is expected to take up North Korea's offer to freeze its nuclear programs as a first step toward what Washington hopes will be a complete dismantling of them.

While the U.S. is willing to see where the North's proposal leads, its ultimate objective is the elimination of Pyongyang's program, State Department spokesman Richard Boucher said. "A freeze is not our goal."

Taiwan's leader calls for demilitarized zone

Taipei, Taiwan

Presenting himself as a peacemaker, Taiwan's leader on Tuesday proposed a demilitarized zone, special envoys and liaison offices with China -- this democratic island nation's biggest security threat.

President Chen Shui-bian made his case during his first news conference in more than three years and linked his proposals to his much-criticized call for a historical March 20 referendum that deals with China relations.

Chen said the referendum, which falls on the same day he seeks re-election, would give voters a chance to decide whether they favour setting up a "peace and stability framework" that would help ease the threat of war with China. Chen said his proposals could be part of this framework.

New train service given cheeky Outback welcome

Sydney

The first passenger train to cross Australia from south to north arrived in Darwin Tuesday to be welcomed by women flashing their breasts and men baring their backsides in a mass "moon."

It was not the reception expected by the dozens of dignitaries, including a former prime minister, Gough Whitlam, who had travelled for 47 hours aboard the 1.6-km-long train from Adelaide.

"There were about 60 of them all lined up," said a photographer, Clive Hyde. "That's the Outback for you -- you're pretty much free to do what you want."

Police asked the group to keep away from a gathering of local families who were also awaiting the arrival of the "Ghan," named after the Afghan camel handlers who helped explore central Australia in the 19th century.

Traversing nearly 3,500 km of desert, scrub and sand dunes, the Ghan route is the longest north-south railway in the world, the realization of a dream dating to 1859. Until now it had extended only as far as Alice Springs, halfway across the continent.

S.D. trial begins for man charged in 1975 death

Rapid City, S.D.

Jury selection started Tuesday in the trial of a man charged with the 1975 murder of an aboriginal Canadian woman who participated in an uprising at Wounded Knee a few years earlier.

Arlo Looking Cloud is one of two men charged in the killing of Anna Mae Pictou-Aquash, a Mi'kmaq from Nova Scotia whose frozen body was found on the Pine Ridge Indian reservation in February 1976.

After investigating the case for years with little luck, federal agents arrested Looking Cloud in Denver last March. Authorities have not discussed a motive or what evidence led to his arrest after more than 25 years.

The other suspect, John Graham, was arrested in Vancouver and is free on bail. He has said he will fight extradition to the United States.

Anchorage, Alaska

Sperm whales have the largest brain of any animal and some in the Gulf of Alaska are proving it at mealtimes by letting humans do all the work.

Researchers are now investigating what commercial fisherman have long noticed, that the whales have learned to pluck sablefish off hooks attached to their long fishing lines.

"They somehow just pick them off like grapes," said fisherman Dick Curran,. "I don't know how they do it."

No one knows how the whales have come to target sablefish, also called black cod, whose oily, rich flesh has become a lucrative product in Japanese markets. So a team of commercial fishermen and biologists has begun to investigate with about $200,000 US from the North Pacific Research Board.

"We don't want the fishermen to have an economic loss. Plus it's a biological loss, because we don't know how many sablefish are being taken," said whale specialist Jan Straley, a lead investigator in the project.

"My interest is biological and I really want to understand what these whales are doing."

NATO-YUGOSLAVIA: NATO promises more attacks at heart of Yugoslavia; refugee crisis worsens

-BODY- BELGRADE, Yugoslavia - NATO promises more attacks like the one that destroyed Yugoslavia's Interior Ministry if the weather improves, while the allies scramble to help neighboring regions deal with hundreds of thousands of Kosovo Albanian refugees. A NATO spokesman says all of Kosovo's ethnic Albanians could be forced out within three weeks.

WASHINGTON - Nearly two weeks into NATO's air campaign against Serb forces, chilling pictures of thousands of Kosovar refugees provide grim confirmation of the yawning gap between the alliance's objectives and the reality on the ground. In the battle between Balkan tribalism and high tech aerial warfare, tribalism has the clear edge in the early going.

Two postal workers dead; inhalation anthrax is suspected cause

WASHINGTON (AP) - Damage from the anthrax-by-mail attack spiraled, with two postal workers dead of what officials suspect was inhalation anthrax and two more hospitalized. Officials were monitoring nine others with suspicious symptoms.

The Postal Service defended a delay in looking for anthrax at the city's central facility, where the victims worked, and considered new precautions for workers nationwide.

Testing for anthrax continued Monday at Washington's Brentwood postal facility, a week after a tainted letter first appeared on Capitol Hill. Health officials said they would expand testing to 36 post offices across the city that received mail from Brentwood, as investigators tried to pinpoint any other sites contaminated with anthrax.

And authorities said postal workers citywide should begin taking preventive antibiotics, with the number of people prescribed preventive antibiotics nearing 10,000 in Washington alone.

U.S. jets blast oil storage facilities; opposition reports U.S. attacks around key city

BAGRAM, Afghanistan (AP) - U.S. jets blasted oil storage facilities in the Taliban stronghold of Kandahar on Tuesday, and the opposition reported U.S. attacks around a key northern city which the anti-Taliban rebels have been trying to take for years.

Near the front line north of Kabul, a Taliban rocket slammed into the main bazaar in the opposition-held town of Charikar, killing two people including a 60-year-old vegetable vendor, witnesses said.

Opposition spokesmen complained that U.S. jets were still not striking close enough to the front to enable their forces to advance.

In Uzbekistan, opposition spokesman Ibrahim Ghafoori said American planes were attacking Taliban positions around Mazar-e-Sharif, a key northern city which the rebels have been trying to recapture since they lost it in 1998. Ghafoori said opposition fighters had advanced six to nine miles toward Mazar-e-Sharif in brisk fighting Monday and Tuesday.

AP News in Brief

Opposition officials also reported a third day of airstrikes Tuesday along the front line north of the capital Kabul, the opposition official said. However, Taliban fighters along the Kabul front were holding their ground, responding with rockets and mortars toward front line opposition positions.

Southern Pakistani city tense as militants vow to march on air base

JACOBABAD, Pakistan (AP) - Police locked down a southern city Tuesday after Islamic militants vowed to marshal thousands of supporters to storm an air base that is providing support to U.S. military personnel.

More than 100 people had been arrested by midmorning after a protest inside Jacobabad, site of Shahbaz Air Base.

Blockades and sandbag bunkers were erected around the city, most shops were closed and many streets were deserted except for heavily armed patrols of police, army and paramilitary troops.

Islamic militants summoned by Jamaat-e-Islami, Pakistan's largest and most influential religious party, vowed to seize the base Tuesday afternoon. They want to expel U.S. personnel supporting the U.S.-led military campaign designed to root out terrorist installations in Afghanistan belonging to Osama bin Laden.

Roads to the city have been blocked for days to prevent mass entry. But on Tuesday morning, about 200 militant Muslims appeared inside the city, chanting anti-government slogans. They made no immediate move toward the base three miles away.

Police rushed them with batons, ordering them to disperse. Nearly all were arrested, according to an Associated Press photographer on the scene who said at least five protesters appeared to have been injured by batons.

Terror investigators look at foreign exchange companies

WASHINGTON (AP) - Investigators are looking at whether terrorists may have laundered money through foreign exchange bureaus. Two men faced charges about financial transactions in connection with the terrorism investigation, but neither been linked to the Sept. 11 attacks.

German Interior Minister Otto Schily said foreign exchange companies that operate globally could have been used by terrorists. He would not name specific companies but urged money exchange firms to cooperate.

"I don't want to mention some names, but it also includes the role of some companies doing the exchange of money and delivering money. Maybe they are situated in the United States," said Schily.

Schily oversees interior security in Germany, where several suspected hijackers lived and may have plotted the Sept. 11 hijackings. He was in Washington on Monday to meet with Bush administration officials.

Elsewhere, a Saudi man who apparently holds a student pilot's license was arrested in Missouri on a bank fraud charge.

The FBI has not tied Adel F. Badri to last month's attacks in which terrorists crashed airliners in New York, Washington and Pennsylvania. Badri was charged with bank fraud for cashing allegedly forged checks worth $10,000, according to an FBI affidavit released by the Justice Department.

Hundreds drown when refugee boat sinks

AP News in Brief

BOGOR, Indonesia (AP) - Traumatized survivors of a boat sinking compared the tragedy to the film "Titanic" and one said 200 people, mainly women and children, were trapped in the vessel's hull as it sunk off the Indonesia coast.

Others drowned after floating in the water for hours. Officials say the death toll may pass 350.

The wooden boat, which was reportedly carrying illegal immigrants to neighboring Australia, sank Friday. U.N. officials said only 44 survivors were pulled from the water out of a reported 421 on board. News of the catastrophe was only made public on Monday.

By Tuesday some survivors were recovering in a refugee camp, said Kemala Ahwil, spokeswoman for the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees in Jakarta.

Sinn Fein's Gerry Adams calls for disarmament

LONDON (AP) - Britain and Ireland awaited a breakthrough in Northern Ireland's crumbling peace process after IRA-allied Sinn Fein urged the paramilitary group to make a long-delayed move on disarmament.

Sinn Fein leader Gerry Adams called on Irish Republican Army supporters to act with "clear heads and brave hearts" in moving the peace process forward. His statement Monday came within days of the likely collapse of Northern Ireland's power-sharing government, created as part of the Good Friday peace agreement of 1998 but hobbled repeatedly by the disarmament issue.

As in 1997, when the IRA announced a cease-fire a day after Adams publicly recommended it, his speech raised expectations of a quick IRA gesture.

Leaders of the Ulster Unionist Party, whose support is essential to the survival of Northern Ireland's government, resigned their posts last week hoping to force an IRA move. They have said they would return to the government if the IRA began to disarm.

Israel insists on holding West Bank towns despite U.S. demand to leave

JERUSALEM (AP) - Israel insists on holding six West Bank towns until its demands are met, despite stiff U.S. criticism of the widest Israeli incursion in seven years.

While complaining bitterly about the Israeli stranglehold on six of the eight main towns in the West Bank, Palestinians also charged Monday that Israel was behind an explosion that killed a prominent Hamas militant in the city of Nablus.

In Washington, the U.S. government issued its harshest criticism yet of the Israeli incursion, rejecting Israeli arguments that the move was necessary in the wake of the assassination of Cabinet minister Rehavam Zeevi last week. State Department spokesman Philip Reeker expressed regret over the deaths of Palestinian civilians during the operation, now in its sixth day.

Israel has remained defiant, responding with a statement that said, "The murder of Rehavam Zeevi crossed the red line, and Israel, as any democratic country, is exerting its right to self defense and the defense of its citizens."

Exchanges of fire continued at night in the biblical town of Bethlehem, where Israeli tanks took up positions a few miles from the Church of the Nativity, marking the traditional birthplace of Jesus.

Indonesian parliament passes autonomy bill for troubled Irian Jaya

JAKARTA, Indonesia (AP) - Indonesia's parliament has passed a bill granting the rebellious province of Irian Jaya sweeping autonomy, a greater share of resource revenues - and a new name.

The government expects the new law will help end a long-running separatist struggle in the region, on the western half of New Guinea island.

Under the new legislation, the province will have its name officially changed to Papua, a move the indigenous population has long sought. It will also retain 80 percent of royalties from logging and fishing, and 70 percent from mining and the exploitation of oil and natural gas reserves, lawmaker Sabam Sirait said Tuesday.

Pro-independence politicians have long complained that the region gets little back from the revenues it generates. The bill also permits the province to fly its independence flag and use its own anthem, Sirait said.

Convicted killer who was 17 at time of slaying put to death

HUNTSVILLE, Texas (AP) - A convicted killer who was 17 at the time of the murder was executed after losing an appeal that attempted to make his age a rallying point for keeping him from the death chamber.

Gerald Mitchell, 33, had spent nearly half of his life on death row before the Monday execution, which marked the 19th time since 1976 a U.S. inmate was put to death for a murder committed when the killer was younger than 18.

He apologized to the victim's mother and told his family and friends to be strong. His sister, Marsha, sobbed and slid to her knees on the floor of the witness area,

"I am sorry for the life I took from you," Mitchell said, looking at Diane Marino, whose son Charles was killed. "I sincerely apologize."

By the time he was arrested for shooting three people in 1985, killing two of them, the 17-year-old Mitchell had a history of robbery and theft and had been expelled from an alternative school.

Mitchell was accused of killing Charles Anthony Marino, 20, who was shot with a sawed-off shotgun after he and his brother-in-law, Kenneth Fleming, tried to buy $1 worth of marijuana from Mitchell in Houston, court records show.

Yankees mothball Mariners for fourth straight World Series trip

NEW YORK (AP) - The New York Yankees beat the Seattle Mariners 12-3 Monday to win the American League championship series and a chance to capture their fourth straight World Series.

Next up for New York is Game 1 of the World Series against the Arizona Diamondbacks in Arizona on Saturday night.

The Yankees have played for baseball's ultimate title 37 times and won it 26 times, the most successful professional sports franchise in history.

Only five times in baseball history has a team won four straight pennants, none since another group of Yankees started a similar run in 1960.

The Diamondbacks beat the Atlanta Braves 3-1 in Game 5 of the National League championship series Sunday. They reached the series faster than any expansion team, doing it in only their fourth year.

Memorial Service held at ground zero for families of victims of World Trade Center attack

NEW YORK (AP) - The families of people killed in the Sept. 11 terrorist attack gathered Sunday for a memorial service filled with prayer and song.

City officials estimated the crowd at 9,200, far more than expected. Mourners filled the rows of chairs to capacity; some people were forced to stand. Many wore the jackets and headgear of the police and fire units to which their loved ones belonged.

It was only the second time in the seven weeks since the attack, the round-the-clock recovery and demolition work at the site was halted to allow for the memorial service. The first time was on Oct. 11 at 8:48 a.m. - one month to the minute after the first hijacked plane struck the trade center's north tower - when a moment of silence was observed.

More than 4,000 people are still missing.

Misdirected air strikes kill more civilians in Afghan capital, near northern front lines

KABUL, Afghanistan (AP) - American airstrikes meant to punish the Taliban spilled over Sunday into residential neighborhoods of the Afghan capital, killing 13 civilians - the second time in as many days that missiles have accidentally hit homes and killed residents.

Later Sunday, U.S. jets were back over the skies of the beleaguered Afghan capital, and strong explosions could be heard in the direction of the main road from Kabul to the opposition-controlled Bagram air base.

Weeping families buried their dead hours after the morning bombardment, apparently aimed at Taliban targets to the north and east of Kabul.

In Washington, Pentagon spokesmen had no immediate comment on the latest strikes and civilian casualties involved.

CDC confirms eighth inhalation anthrax case

AP News in Brief

WASHINGTON (AP) - The Centers for Disease Control and prevention confirmed that a female New Jersey postal worker has inhalation anthrax, the most serious form of the disease that has claimed three lives and prompted thousands to take antibiotics.

CDC spokesman Tom Skinner stressed it was not a new case of the disease but one that had been listed as suspected anthrax. Lab tests confirmed the diagnosis, he said.

At least five New Jersey postal workers have suspected or confirmed cases of anthrax. Anthrax-tainted letters sent to Washington and New York originated there.

The diagnosis came as tests continued at postal and government offices in the nation's capital and elsewhere. Officials were seeking to determine whether other tainted letters are in the mail system. Thousands of postal workers and others who dealt with large amounts of mail were being urged to take preventive antibiotics.

There have been 14 confirmed cases of anthrax in the outbreak, including eight inhaled versions of the disease. Six people in New York and New Jersey are being treated for the less dangerous skin form of anthrax, and a few other cases are suspected.

CIA sent drone to save Afghan guerrilla hunted by Taliban

WASHINGTON (AP) - The CIA sent a missile-armed drone to protect Afghan opposition leader Abdul Haq in his flight from the Taliban, hitting a vehicle convoy but failing to prevent Haq's capture and execution.

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said Sunday on ABC's "This Week" that Haq called for help and then received air support.

Asked if it was military air support, he said, "It was from another element of the government." He did not go into detail.

On Friday, Taliban forces spotted Haq and a group of companions traveling on a mountain road near Jalalabad in eastern Afghanistan.

The Predator reached the area a few hours later and struck a Taliban convoy.

But Haq and some others from his group were captured and hanged as spies, according to Haq's nephew in Pakistan. Haq's group had entered Pakistan to encourage an anti-Taliban uprising among fellow ethnic Pashtuns.

Israel starts pullback operation from Bethlehem, Beit Jalla; shootings kill five Israelis

BETHLEHEM, West Bank (AP) - Israeli forces began pulling out of two West Bank towns Sunday, despite an attack by Palestinian gunmen on a bus stop in the north of the country that killed four Israelis.

The shooting attack in Hadera and a drive-by shooting earlier in the day that killed an Israeli soldier had thrown the pullback into question, with Israeli officials demanding a cease-fire before they would withdraw.

In the evening, Israeli tanks and armored personnel carriers were seen leaving the biblical town of Bethlehem and nearby Beit Jalla, and others still in the towns were pulling back toward Israeli territory, witnesses said.

Raanan Gissin, an aide to Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, said the redeployment operation had begun after the Palestinians took steps and "started to comply with their obligations."

Palestinian police moved into take over security operations in certain positions and made some arrests, he said without elaborating.

Rioting continues in Belfast before key legislative vote

BELFAST, Northern Ireland (AP) - Rioting flared Sunday in a divided section of Belfast as Northern Ireland headed toward a crucial legislative vote. More than 20 police officers were injured.

Catholics and Protestants fought along Limestone Road, a common flashpoint for sectarian violence, a Royal Ulster Constabulary spokesman said.

Several homemade grenades were thrown at police and army lines during fighting that continued all day, police said. They said 23 officers were wounded, and several security force vehicles were damaged.

There have been sporadic outbreaks of violence in Belfast in recent days.

Protestants are split over the significance of the destruction of an arms cache last week by the Irish Republican Army.

Musharraf accuses India of threatening regional peace

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan (AP) - Pakistani President Gen. Pervez Musharraf accused India on Sunday of threatening regional peace and trying to dominate South Asia.

The two countries have accused one another of taking advantage of the turmoil in Afghanistan to strengthen their positions in Kashmir, the Himalayan region claimed by both.

Musharraf said India has engaged in "massive shelling" of Pakistani positions in Kashmir.

The shelling began earlier this month, and Pakistan has responded in kind. The two-way artillery barrage ended a 10-month peace on the cease-fire line dividing the province.

Hindu-dominated India accuses Pakistan of supporting Islamic militants in India's part of Kashmir, its only Muslim majority state. The guerrillas are waging a secessionist war to merge the state of Jammu-Kashmir with Muslim Pakistan or declare independence. Pakistan denies the charge.

Ukraine's president promises compensation to Israeli families for plane crash

KIEV, Ukraine (AP) - President Leonid Kuchma has promised that Ukraine will compensate the families of Israelis killed when a Ukrainian missile accidentally shot down a Russian passenger jet, officials said Sunday.

The Sibir Airlines Tu-154 crashed into the Black Sea on Oct. 4 on its way from Israel to Novosibirsk, Russia, killing all 78 people aboard. Most of the passengers had recently emigrated from Russia to Israel.

Kuchma promised compensation during a telephone conversation with Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon on Saturday, presidential spokesman Ihor Storozhuk said.

Israeli Foreign Ministry spokesman Emmanuel Nachshon said the ministry was satisfied by the announcement and would "open a diplomatic dialogue concerning all aspects of the tragedy."

Megawati nears 100-day mark, says Indonesia in danger of breakup

JAKARTA, Indonesia - Nearing the 100-day mark as president of Indonesia, Megawati Sukarnoputri warned Sunday that the world's fourth most populous nation is in danger of breaking up and becoming the "Balkans of the East."

"If (violence) continues, we will split into lots of small races, into lots of small countries all of which will be weak in the face of outside forces," Megawati said at a ceremony commemorating the birth of Indonesia's nationalist movement in 1928.

The president passes the 100-day milestone on Tuesday. Despite Sunday's warning, she is increasingly accused of doing little to defuse multiple ethnic and religious conflicts.

On July 23, Megawati replaced Abdurrahman Wahid, the first freely elected president after 32 years of military dictatorship by President Suharto. The national assembly ousted Wahid after 21 erratic months in office during which Megawati served as vice president.

Deadly bomb blast in southern Philippine city where U.S. military advisers are staying

ZAMBOANGA, Philippines (AP) - A powerful bomb tore through a food court Sunday, killing at least six people and injuring scores while U.S. military officers were in town to discuss helping the government fight Muslim rebels.

The Americans were unhurt in the early evening attack in this city in the restive southern Philippines, officials said.

There was no evidence the group of more than 20 Americans was targeted, but Cimatu said the bombing might have been a protest against their presence.

Cimatu said among the suspects was the Abu Sayyaf, an extremist Muslim group the Philippine military is targeting in a major offensive focusing on nearby Basilan island.

The U.S. officers were here for talks on how the United States can help the Philippine government fight the Abu Sayyaf. The United States says the group has ties to Osama bin Laden, the chief suspect in the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks on New York and Washington.

United's CEO James Goodwin resigns, replaced by retired head of Weyerhaeuser

CHICAGO (AP) - United Airlines replaced embattled chairman and chief executive James Goodwin on Sunday with board member John Creighton, less than two weeks after Goodwin's warning that the carrier could "perish" next year.

The parent company of the nation's second-biggest airline, UAL Corp., said Goodwin had resigned and released a statement quoting him as saying it was "the right time for a new leader."

Its choice of the 69-year-old Creighton, the retired head of Weyerhaeuser Co., came with the company under enormous pressure from shareholders and employees to oust Goodwin.

Creighton, who was CEO and president of the timber giant from 1991-97 and a UAL board member since 1998, acknowledged he is an interim leader. He said he will head Elk Grove Village, Ill.-based United "until we are confident that the company is on the road to financial stability."

Mars Odyssey delays photo shoot of Red Planet as it slows entry into atmosphere

PASADENA, Calif. (AP) - NASA's Mars Odyssey spacecraft has delayed its first photo shoot of the Red Planet until at least Tuesday after scientists decided to slow the spacecraft's entry into the atmosphere, a mission official said Sunday.

The slowing is not the result of any problems with the unmanned probe that reached Mars and entered orbit last Tuesday, said mission manager David A. Spencer of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration's Jet Propulsion Laboratory.

Scientists are trying to avoid any problems caused by friction from Odyssey's descent into the atmosphere. Too much friction could hurt the winglike 75-square-foot solar array that powers Odyssey, although a catastrophic failure is unlikely, Spencer said.

The slowing means the spacecraft will take longer to tighten its orbit of Mars and reach an optimum altitude for the photos, which had been expected Sunday.

Despite the delay, the $297 million mission "couldn't be going better," Spencer said.

Czechs take sober look at EU after voting 'yes'

Prague

A day after voting decisively to join the European Union, Czechs on Sunday began looking ahead to the benefits of integration -- and the expected hardships.

The sober debate came a day after fireworks lit up the skies over Prague Castle to celebrate that this central European country of 10 million voted to take part in the largest expansion of the EU next year.

"The EU is not a prescription. It is an opportunity and we have to solve our own problems and modernize our society," Prime Minister Vladimir Spidla said in a televised debate Sunday.

On Saturday, Spidla and other officials were more enthusiastic.
Compiled from Star News Services

"This is a victory for the Czech people," Spidla said late Saturday. "For me this is the end of World War II, with all its consequences."

The victory came after a lacklustre campaign that nonetheless persuaded Czechs of the economic benefits of joining the EU.

British army dismantles van bomb in North Ireland

Londonderry, Northern Ireland

British army experts dismantled a large van bomb Sunday that had been abandoned by a roadside in Londonderry, Northern Ireland's second-largest city.

No group claimed responsibility for the thwarted attack, but police and politicians blamed Irish Republican Army dissidents opposed to the IRA's 1997 ceasefire.

Police said the bombers were spotted driving the van in a suspicious manner on the Foyle Bridge, one of two bridges that connect Londonderry's predominantly Catholic west side with its mostly Protestant east.

WORLD REPORT

After the bombers left the van at a roadside near the city's hospital, police said they inspected the vehicle and found two explosives-filled drums attached to wires.

The British army's bomb disposal squad later estimated the bomb weighed about 250 kg -- large by the standards of dissident IRA groups.

BT in 'zero tolerance' blitz on Internet porn

London

British Telecom has launched one of the toughest crackdowns ever by a company on staff looking at pornography on the Internet, sacking 200 employees and reporting 10 of them to the police.

The company said it had decided on a "zero-tolerance" approach toward staff using porn sites and that it is confident the practice is now all but wiped out.

Pierre Danon, the chief executive of BT Retail, said that he and Ben Verwaayen, the group chief executive, decided to send e-mails to all staff last year warning them against trying to gain access to pornographic sites during working hours.

A second warning followed months later when the initial e-mail failed to stamp out the practice.

According to some studies, a third of all U.K. Internet users log on to porn sites and an estimated two-thirds of porn traffic occurs between 9 a.m. and 5 p.m.

Paris Air Show takes off amid gloom in aviation

Le Bourget, France

Fewer jets are on hand and the U.S. military presence is a shadow of its former self, but the Paris Air Show opened to a delighted public Sunday in a year of economic turbulence for the world's top commercial plane makers.

French Mirage 2000 and Rafale fighter planes roared overhead, carrying out dramatic corkscrew spins as thousands of people craned their necks at the show's public opening.

Despite the impressive aerial acrobatics, the global aviation industry is slumping and the air show is feeling it. Only 206 planes are on display this year -- 20 fewer than at the last Paris show two years ago -- and exhibit space has shrunk five per cent.

The show, first held in 1909 -- six years after the Wright brothers' historic flight, offers airplane makers a chance to strike deals, subcontractors to showcase their technologies and national militaries to tout their air power.

French cabinet minister blasts U.S. defence policy

Paris

France's defence minister criticized her U.S. counterpart Donald Rumsfeld in an interview published Saturday as someone who considers the United States the world's only military, economic and financial power.

Michele Alliot-Marie also accused U.S. industry of waging "economic war" by trying to "take over the capital" of European defence-related industries.

Europeans must regroup to resist, she said, in the interview in Le Monde newspaper.

Alliot-Marie's blunt remarks recalled the bad blood between Paris and Washington over France's leading role in opposing the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq.

WORLD REPORT

"The American defence secretary believes that the United States is the world's only military, economic and financial power," Alliot-Marie told Le Monde.

"We do not share this vision."

German chancellor wins support for economic plan

Cottbus, Germany

German Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder's junior coalition partner, the Greens, gave tentative backing Saturday to his plans to shake up the job market and trim the welfare state to try and revive the stagnant economy.

At a special party conference, 360 delegates chose a motion backing policies proposed by Schroeder. Two rival motions were discarded. The delegates were to consider proposed amendments to the motion before voting on it later.

Germany, Europe's biggest economy, is mired in a third year of near-zero growth that has seen unemployment rise to post-reunification records.

Schroeder has responded with plans to create jobs and ease the burden on the government and employers.

Briton trying to row boat across Pacific is rescued

Tokyo

Japanese coast guard plucked a British man from waters off Japan's northern coast early Sunday after his boat's rudder broke, forcing him to abandon an attempt to row across the Pacific Ocean, officials said.

Mick Dawson, uninjured and in good health, was rescued at 3:50 a.m. local time Sunday, about 640 km off the coast of Miyagi prefecture by coast guard searchers dispatched on a patrol vessel, said Koji Narita, a coast guard official.

Heavy fog prevented a search plane from spotting him for hours but the patrol boat eventually found Dawson, he said.

Narita said the patrol boat carrying Dawson was expected to reach a local port early today.

Myanmar won't commit to a date to free Suu Kyi

Phnom Penh

Myanmar's foreign minister said Sunday his country will not commit itself to a date for releasing opposition leader Aung San Suu Kyi.

But the government definitely wants to free her when the time comes, Foreign Minister Win Aung said in the Cambodian capital where he will attend an annual Association of Southeast Asian Nations conference beginning Monday.

Suu Kyi was detained May 30 after a clash between her supporters and a pro-government mob in northern Myanmar. She has been kept incommunicado since, jeopardizing the reconciliation process to end the country's 15-year-old political deadlock.

Sri Lanka hikes security after violent incidents

Colombo

WORLD REPORT

The Sri Lankan military stepped up security in the capital Colombo and the Tamil city Jaffna on Sunday, a day after a clash between the navy and the Tamil Tiger rebels raised tension between the two sides, who are observing a ceasefire.

In Colombo, police were checking vehicles -- as they routinely did before the February 2002 ceasefire halted Sri Lanka's 19-year civil war.

In Jaffna, where a top Tamil politician opposed to the rebels was assassinated Saturday, the military was checking vehicles and travellers.

The developments further cloud the fate of the truce.

Since April, the rebels have refused to take part in peace talks, accusing the government of not doing enough to help Tamils.

The rebels want more autonomy in areas where most of Sri Lanka's 3.2 million Tamils live, charging discrimination by the majority Sinhalese, who number 14 million.

Afghanistan's insurgents stepping up attacks: U.S.

Kabul, Afghanistan

Insurgents have been stepping up attacks on coalition forces in Afghanistan with the advent of warmer weather and on Saturday fired rockets at a U.S. base in the east of the country, the U.S. military said.

Three rockets were fired at the U.S. base in Asadabad, the capital of Kunar province, U.S. military spokesman Col. Rodney Davis said. The rockets fell harmlessly, as scores of others have over the past year, causing no damage or casualties.

Last week, insurgents fired on patrolling U.S. forces near Shkin, a volatile town in Paktika province near the Pakistan border, triggering a firefight that left four attackers dead.

Saudi police kill five in Mecca apartment raid

Mecca, Saudi Arabia

Police fought overnight gunbattles with suspected al-Qaida militants who were planning an imminent terrorist attack, killing five and arresting others believed linked to last month's suicide bombings in Riyadh, Saudi officials said Sunday.

One security official said two police officers were killed in a shootout at a checkpoint shortly before a fierce gunbattle erupted during a raid on a bomb-filled, booby-trapped apartment late Saturday.

The Saudi Interior Ministry released a statement saying the raid took place at an apartment building in the al-Khalidiya district, about five km from the main Mecca mosque, at 9:30 p.m.

The statement said police clashed with a "group of terrorists ... (who) were preparing an imminent terrorist act."

No details of the plot were given.

Scott Peterson getting loads of letters in jail

Modesto, Calif.

Scott Peterson, charged with murdering his pregnant wife and their unborn child, is receiving stacks of letters in jail, many of them from women, a newspaper reported Sunday.

WORLD REPORT

A fellow inmate told the Modesto Bee that Peterson's correspondents include a woman serving time for murdering her husband. A guard read the letter aloud, inmate Chris Young said.

Peterson has pleaded not guilty to double-murder charges that make him eligible for the death penalty if convicted.

Late last week, a judge issued a gag order barring lawyers, witnesses and police officers from publicly discussing details of the case. Judge Al Girolami said the gag order was the only way to stop leaks and rumours from derailing Scott Peterson's right to a fair trial.

Search ends for two still missing after nine drown

Garibaldi, Ore.

All eight survivors among the 19 people thrown into the ocean when a wave capsized their small charter fishing boat were wearing the vessel's bright orange life vests, authorities said Sunday. None of the dead was.

Coast guard helicopters and boats returned for several hours Sunday to search for two men still missing since the accident at the mouth of Tillamook Bay a day earlier. On shore, federal investigators walked the beach, collecting the remaining soaked life jackets that had washed up from the wreck of the Taki Too.

National Transportation Safety Board official John Goglia told reporters the investigation would examine the condition of the ocean when the 10-metre boat set out early Saturday, as well as the boat itself and its equipment.

One prairie dog linked to half of suspected cases

Madison, Wis.

A single prairie dog infected with monkeypox before health officials identified the virus may have been responsible for spreading monkeypox to half of the human cases in Wisconsin, a state health official said Saturday.

"A lot of people got exposed over time," said Robert Ehlenfeldt, acting state veterinarian. "That exposure would have happened before we knew what we were dealing with."

State epidemiologist Jeff Davis said that the prairie dog had been linked to three confirmed human cases, six probable cases, nine suspected cases and a case of monkeypox in a rabbit, which infected one of the humans.

"Clearly a super-spreader if there ever was one," he said.

Ehlenfeldt took a more cautious approach, saying the prairie dog probably was not more contagious than other prairie dogs with the disease; it just had more contact with humans.

IRA won't undermine peace efforts: Adams

Belfast

Seeking to keep Northern Ireland's elections on course, Sinn Fein party leader Gerry Adams pledged Wednesday that the Irish Republican Army would not undermine the province's 1998 peace agreement and the joint Catholic-Protestant administration it created.

Adams' statement was billed by the IRA-linked party as his clearest yet on the crisis that pulled the plug on power-sharing in October, but it still left key questions unanswered and the May 29 elections for Northern Ireland's legislature in doubt. Britain and the major Protestant party dismissed his words as inadequate.

"The IRA leadership is determined that there will be no activities which will undermine in any way the peace process and the Good Friday agreement," said Adams, a reputed IRA commander.

Bardot bemoans the cruel world, but praises Le Pen

Paris

Brigitte Bardot is appalled by the world and has written a new book, A Cry in the Silence, attacking the state of humanity.

Compiled from Star News Services

The former actress turned animal rights activist lives between two villas near St. Tropez. She sleeps in one, surrounded by nine dogs, 40 cats, a fourth husband, Bernard and a cemetery for her pets. In the daytime she inhabits the second, where she keeps horses, donkeys, goats, pigs, geese and ducks.

She rarely ventures out except to fight on behalf of animals. But her world vision, she told Paris Match magazine, is "inspired by the blood and atrocities I bathe in" and gives her a "shocking view of humanity, which at a global level, I detest."

But some individuals can move her, notably the right-wing Jean-Marie Le Pen, National Front leader and Trotskyite Arlette Laguiller, who "have remained faithful to the same ideas" and like her "have not changed."

Bardot writes of the mistreatment of the elderly, the abuse of public money, the horror of abattoirs and war and the pointlessness of military service.

More nations condemning Euro-army as NATO threat

London

Diplomatic warfare over proposals for a new Euro-army intensified Wednesday as Greece and Russia came out in support of it while others, including Britain, condemned the initiative as a divisive threat to NATO.

Greece became the only other EU member to support a call by France, Germany, Belgium and Luxembourg to boost Europe's self-reliance in defence one day after the four countries had met in Brussels.

Russia added its weight, to the consternation of its former central European satellites, saying that it considered "that yesterday's meeting marks the start of a process at the heart of the European Union."

But condemnation of the initiative spread across Europe as concerns grew over what was being seen as an attempt by a small caucus to loosen American and NATO ties to Europe.

Local elections provide judgment on Blair's rule

London

Prime Minister Tony Blair led Britain into an unpopular war and emerged with a decisive military victory and an enhanced approval rating. But back on the home front, he faces a hard slog over his plans to reshape Britain's battered public services.

Most analysts expect Blair's Labour party to lose ground in mid-term local elections.

Britons vote today for more than 10,000 seats on 308 of 388 local councils across England, as well as for legislatures in Scotland and Wales, in the first postwar test of the government's support. No parliamentary seats are at stake.

Labour holds a big majority in Parliament and polls taken since the end of the Iraq war give the party a comfortable lead of at least 10 points over the opposition Conservatives.

Forensic biologist who cracked ripper case dies

London

Stuart Kind, a leading forensic biologist who helped British police crack the "Yorkshire Ripper" serial murder case, has died at 78, his son said Wednesday.

Kind died April 19 at home in Harrogate, northeast England, of cancer, Alan Kind said.

The "Yorkshire Ripper" murdered 13 women across the north of Britain in the 1970s in a killing spree that shocked the nation and sparked a major police investigation. Truck driver Peter Sutcliffe was later convicted of the slayings.

Police sought help from Kind, who described the area of northern England where the killer lived.

Using techniques he had picked up while serving as a navigator in the RAF in the Second World War, he mapped the dates and times of the murders and correctly concluded the killer lived between the towns of Shipley and Bingley. Sutcliffe was arrested within two weeks of Kind's report.

Kind later helped research into how Sutcliffe evaded the police for five years.

Union: Talks deadlocked in Nigerian hostage-taking

Lagos, Nigeria

World report

Oil company and labour negotiators trying to end an 11-day hostage standoff broke off talks Wednesday "in deadlock," union leaders said, as navy ships sailed toward offshore drilling rigs where 97 foreigners were being held.

After four hours of negotiations in the commercial capital of Lagos, Peter Akpatason, president of Nigeria's largest oil union, accused company and government officials of "planning to use force" to end the standoff by 100 disgruntled Nigerian workers.

"If they use force and hurt any of our members, we will hurt the economy," Akpatason warned without elaborating.

Capt. Shinebi Hungiapuko refused to say how many ships were involved.

The navy move came as oil officials held negotiations with union members representing the strikers. ATV News in Halifax reported two Canadians are on one of the rigs where workers are being held.

The rigs are drilling wells run on behalf of oil multinationals Royal/Dutch Shell and TotalFinaElf.

About 100 strikers have prevented the foreign oil workers, including 35 Britons and 17 Americans, from leaving four offshore rigs owned by Houston-based Transocean since April 19.

Another 170 Nigerian "third-party personnel" from other companies also were prevented from leaving.

Hindu nationalist party leader shot dead in India

Patna, India

A Hindu nationalist party leader was shot and killed in India's eastern state of Bihar on Wednesday by political rivals, police said.

Satyanarain Sinha of the Bharatiya Janata Party was killed by supporters of Rashtriya Janata Dal, the state governing party, a police officer said on condition of anonymity.

Details of the attack in Danapur, a town 15 km west of Patna, the state capital, were not available.

About 100 angry BJP supporters immediately converged on the residence of a relative of Rabri Devi, the state chief minister, in Danapur and refused to disperse until the assailants were arrested by police.

They burned four buses, police said.

Indonesian officials lay first Bali bombing charge

Bali, Indonesia

Indonesian prosecutors on Wednesday charged the first suspect in last year's Bali bombings that killed 202 people, mostly foreign tourists, including two Canadians.

The suspect, known by the single name Amrozi, is one of 32 people detained on suspicion of involvement in the Oct. 12 attack. His arrest Nov. 5 was considered the first major break in the investigation.

Antasari Ashar, a spokesman for the prosecution, said Amrozi had been charged with violating the country's new anti-terror laws. If convicted, he faces a maximum punishment of death. His trial is expected to begin in mid-May.

Police sheepish over rustling in California

Davis, Calif.

Someone stole 25 sheep sometime between April 10 and April 13. Whoever did it seems to have pulled the wool over several pairs of eyes.

World report

The Davis police have called the offence grand theft. But two weeks after the crime occurred, they still have "no suspects, no leads, just missing sheep," Sgt. Scott Smith said.

The victim is John Thomas Muller, 42, of Dixon. Along with 25 ewes, Muller said that a large number of lambs also disappeared. He said he has liability insurance for his animals but no theft insurance. He estimates the theft cost him a minimum of $3,000.

The sheep were surrounded by an electric fence. The gates were locked. Access was restricted. A large white llama stood sentry to protect the herd from domestic animals and coyotes.

Man faces months in jail for killing of rare condor

Los Angeles

A Southern California man has been charged with fatally shooting an endangered California condor.

Britton Cole Lewis, 29, of Tehachapi, faces up to six months in prison and a $15,000 US fine if convicted of shooting the bird, found dead Feb. 13 on a Kern County ranch, federal prosecutor E. Robert Wright said from Fresno.

The condor, known as Adult Condor 8, was one of the few hatched in the wild. She was captured in 1986, the last female of the species caught for an intensive breeding program to save the giant vultures from extinction.

Searchers find live worms from on-board shuttle test

Cape Canaveral, Fla.

Hundreds of worms being used in a science experiment aboard the space shuttle Columbia have been found alive in the wreckage, NASA said Wednesday.

The worms, known as C. elegans, were in debris found in Texas several weeks ago. Technicians sorting through the wreckage at Kennedy Space Center in Florida didn't open the containers of worms and dead moss cells until this week.

All seven astronauts were killed when the shuttle disintegrated over Texas on Feb. 1. Columbia contained almost 60 scientific investigations.

The worms and moss were in the same four-kg locker located in the mid-deck of the space shuttle. The worms were placed in six canisters, each holding eight petri dishes.

The worms, each about the size of a pencil tip, were part of an experiment testing a new synthetic nutrient solution.

The worms, which have a life cycle of between seven and 10 days, were four or five generations old, Buckingham said.

The experiment was put together by researchers at the NASA Ames Research Center in California.

The moss, known as Ceratodon, was used to study how a space-flight environment influences cell growth.

Marine charged with 13 attempted murder counts

Camp Lejeune, N.C.

A 21-year-old marine has been charged with 13 counts of attempted murder for allegedly sabotaging parachutes before a jump last fall that left three fellow marines injured, the military said Wednesday.

World report

The Marines Corps formally referred Lance-Cpl. Antoine Boykins to a general court martial on charges that also include 13 counts of reckless endangerment and one conspiracy to commit premeditated murder. Boykins will remain in confinement at the base.

Three marines were injured last September when their parachutes failed to open after they jumped from 380 metres; their reserve chutes deployed safely.

Three teens charged in 12-year-old boy's murder

Chicago

Three teenagers were charged with first-degree murder in the shooting death of a 12-year-old boy who had just participated in a children's neighbourhood cleanup program.

Leon Brown, 18, fired three shots into a group of young people, as "retaliation for an alleged theft of a bicycle by a rival gang," said Chicago police Cmdr. James Jackson.

One shot struck seventh-grader Rene Guillen, who was on his way to a candy store with other kids who had participated in the cleanup program on Chicago's southwest side. Guillen was not affiliated with a gang, Jackson said. No one else was injured.

Also charged were George Anderson and Cleodis Bassett, two 17-year-olds who were with Brown at the time of the shooting, Jackson said.

Gun amnesty over: Det.-Supt. John Hesketh of West Midlands Police displays some of the more than 800 weapons handed in during this month's gun amnesty in England. The weapons in Birmingham Wednesday included an Uzi submachine-gun, a Bruni imitation handgun, which is easily converted to fire live ammunition, an AK-47, a Thompson submachine-gun and a rocket launcher. The Home Office say the firearms amnesty, which ended at midnight, has seen an estimated 20,000 weapons and 483,000 rounds of ammunition handed in to police and taken out of circulation. Advancing Ethiopian forces claimed on Saturday to have seized a city just 80 kilometers (50 miles) from the Eritrean capital as they pursued their neighbor's retreating army deeper and deeper into its territory. While Eritrea has agreed to peace talks and the surrender of other towns demanded by its Horn of Africa neighbor, Ethiopia said Saturday its 2-week-old offensive would stop only when it had verified Eritrea had withdrawn as promised from all disputed land. Ethiopia's military routed Eritrea's forces from their border strongholds late in the week and has been chasing them north into Eritrea ever since. Saturday, Ethiopia said it had taken the city of Adikeyhe, 50 kilometers (31 miles) north of the border. While the pursuit has followed the road leading to Asmara, Ethiopia has never listed the Eritrean capital as one of its objectives in the war. (HORN OF AFRICA-WAR)

Fiji's president announced Saturday that he has fired the country's democratically elected government, which is being held hostage by an armed gang, and will appoint a new caretaker administration. President Ratu Sir Kamisese Mara also said that rebel leader George Speight and the six gunmen who stormed parliament on May 19 and have held Prime Minister Mahendra Chaudhry and more than 30 members of his government hostage would probably be granted immunity from prosecution for their roles in the coup attempt. BELFAST, Northern Ireland (AP)

With the future of Northern Ireland's peace accord at stake, leaders of the province's largest Protestant party assembled Saturday to decide whether to participate in a revived power-sharing administration. Leader David Trimble has urged the Ulster Unionist Party's 860-member grassroots council to vote yes and put the Irish Republican Army's 3-week-old disarmament pledge to the test. But there is strong opposition from party members who do not trust the IRA's offer to put its weapons "beyond use," and activists on both sides of the bitter argument say the outcome is too close to call. TEHRAN, Iran (AP)

Iran's new parliament opened Saturday, dominated for the first time by reformists who support President Mohammad Khatami's programs to loosen the strict Islamic rules kept in place by hard-line clergy who still wield enormous power. The inauguration ceremony, broadcast live on state-run television and radio, began with the playing of the national anthem and the reading of verses from Islam's holy book, the Koran. The session was attended by senior leaders, military commanders, foreign diplomats and journalists who sat in the visitors' gallery listening through headphones to a translation of the proceeding. In a statement read by an assistant, Supreme leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei said the Majlis, or parliament, should "disappoint the enemy" by defending the country's Islamic establishment. Each battered high-rise becomes a sniper's aerie, each deserted thoroughfare an ambush zone. In this kind of warfare, advances and retreats are measured in blocks or half-blocks, or even just houses. In the calculations of battle, the shield of technology gives way to human failings and human skills -- speed and deception, close knowledge of streets and alleys.

Since Stalingrad and Berlin in World War II, to the American assault on Hue in Vietnam in 1968 and on to the war zones of Beirut or Nablus, Belfast or Mogadishu, urban warfare has become a central part of the underdog's arsenal -- a fight without scruples for the high ground of propaganda that exploits civilian losses and denies the intruder's superior might.

It is precisely that messy, manipulative and murderous kind of fighting between conventional forces and elusive defenders that could confront the Americans and British as they try to enter Baghdad, despite their much-publicized reluctance to engage in a close urban brawl.

"The Iraqis will want to fight close and dirty, with Iraqi tanks darting in and out of garages and buildings; they will conduct small-scale offensive actions with dismounted soldiers supported by mortars," wrote Gen. Wesley Clark, the American former commander who led NATO forces during the Kosovo campaign in 1999.

"The fighting will be full of the tricks we have already seen and more: ambushes, fake surrenders, soldiers dressed as women, attacks on rear areas and command posts. The Iraqis will be prepared to conduct high-risk missions of a kind we would not consider," he said in an article for the Times of London.

For all that allied commanders in Iraq have expressed outrage at what they see as such dishonorable tactics, though, urban warfare has always set its own rules of guile and deceit -- from the legendary use of a wooden horse at Troy over 3,000 years ago to modern times when war is broadcast live 24 hours a day.

In this post-cold-war era of asymmetric warfare -- the conflict between conventional forces and zealous adversaries seeking the chinks in the high-tech Western armor -- the fight has come to mean a contest to disable the technology that enables American forces to contemplate killing without losses of their own.

A NATION AT WAR: HOUSE TO HOUSE Urban Warfare: Long a Key Part of an Underdog's Down-to-Earth Arsenal

That was evident enough in Mogadishu, Somalia, in 1993 when sophisticated Black Hawk helicopter gunships were brought down by crude, shoulder-fired Soviet-era RPG-7 rocket propelled grenades -- a standard item in the kit of guerrilla armies around the globe along with AK-47 assault rifles, land mines and hand grenades. Indeed, similar tactics were popularized by the Afghan guerrillas who battled the Soviets in Afghanistan in the 1980's, courtesy largely of more sophisticated American-supplied Stinger missiles.

The downing of the helicopters in Mogadishu not only seemed a victory for the lightly equipped Somali street fighters. It also led to humiliating American casualties, 18 dead, that hastened the United States withdrawal -- just as images of wounded and slain United States marines at Hue and other battle zones of the Tet offensive in Vietnam turned American opinion against the war.

Those memories underscore the perils of street fighting that face allied troops in Iraq. History offers little solace.

In recent decades, urban warfare has taken many forms, with many aims.

When battle-hardened Soviet troops pushed into Berlin in 1945 against the last feeble remnants of the Third Reich, lofting the Red Flag over the battered Reichstag, their intention was clearly conquest, not the liberation Washington says it seeks in Iraq.

In Beirut in the mid-1970's, by contrast, and in Sarajevo in the 1990's, cities were divided along lines of faith. In Sarajevo, it was a Serbian siege against Muslim-led defenders. In Beirut, the fighting between Muslim and Palestinian forces and Christian militias began with an incongruous war for luxury seafront hotels -- the St. Georges, the Phoenicia, the Palm Beach and the Normandie, won and lost in room-to-room fighting.

The weapons were generally low-tech shoulder-fired antitank grenades, assault rifles and mortars, machine guns mounted on pickup trucks that put a premium on stealth and mobility. But when American marines intervened in Lebanon, an equally crude weapon, a suicide truck bomb, killed more than 230 of them in 1983.

In Berlin, Beirut and Sarajevo -- as in successive waves of Russian assaults on the Chechen capital, Grozny -- the fighting reduced large urban areas to rubble. But it is precisely the familiarity of the urban terrain to those who live there that enables them to use it to the advantages of ambushes, surprise attacks and rapid redeployment.

In Iraq, urban warfare "will negate the technological advantage of the coalition," said Clifford Beal, the editor of Jane's Defense Weekly, a leading publication on military matters. "The Iraqis will be jumping in and out of alleyways, he added. "It tends to become a low-tech, house-to-house situation, and that kind of combat can become very costly for combatants and others."

A war depending on low technology and high numbers of combatants and casualties is the opposite of what most of the modern American army is trained to do. Even the British Army, with three decades of experience fighting the Irish Republican Army in Northern Ireland, would not be familiar either with the Iraqi terrain in cities like Basra or Baghdad or with the much greater firepower Iraqi troops could use in urban areas.

Indeed, said Tom Clonan, a military analyst in Dublin, a more likely comparison for allied troops in Iraq would be the experience of Russian troops fighting Chechen separatist forces in Grozny. "There are striking similarities between Grozny and Baghdad," he said. "Low-tech weapons would form a formidable arsenal in the narrow alleys and back streets of Iraq's capital."

Others draw comparisons to house-to-house fighting in Hue in 1968, which not only sent home bloody images of American casualties but also forced United States commanders to loosen the rules of engagement in a way the Pentagon says it is seeking to avoid in the Iraq war.

That reflects the differences in the role of public opinion for defenders and attackers in any urban warfare in Iraq, where ruthless irregulars and ultra-loyal forces would have few qualms about civilian casualties or using civilians as human shields. The United States and Britain face opinion at home that may prove fickle, constraining their ability to use overwhelming force, military analysts said.

A NATION AT WAR: HOUSE TO HOUSE Urban Warfare: Long a Key Part of an Underdog's Down-to-Earth Arsenal

"The allies are fighting with kid gloves on, but it'll be very difficult to keep this clinical if urban warfare ensues," said Mr. Beal of Jane's Defense Weekly. "Urban warfare takes longer. It can bog down large numbers of troops. This war is being fought on a clock. And the longer it goes on, the more carnage is seen, the more difficult it is for the Bush administration to continue."

In the region's recent history, there are some ominous parallels. When Israeli troops invaded Lebanon in 1982, they evicted Yasir Arafat from Beirut, only to find him depicting his departure as a victory, validated simply by his ability to survive superior force.

Moreover, as The Economist magazine noted last week, the Israelis' welcome was short-lived. "When Israel invaded here in 1982, we met them with showers of rice and roses," a spokesman for the Hezbollah Shiite Muslim militia in Lebanon was quoted as saying. "One hundred days later, we blew up their headquarters."

Photo: A United States Marine Abrams tank patrolled Mogadishu, Somalia, without incident in January 1993. But in October of that year, two American Black Hawk helicopters were downed by guerrillas using relatively unsophisticated weapons, illustrating one of the dangers of urban warfare. (Associated Press) Chart/Diagram: "Soldiers in the Streets" United States Army and Marine Corps doctrine recommends isolating and bypassing urban areas when possible, because cities are difficult, dangerous and costly to fight in. Still, most soldiers undergo some form of training in the very complicated business of urban combat. If American forces must fight in Baghdad, here are just a few of the thousands of special considerations they may need to keep in mind as they hit the streets.

DOUBLE COLUMN -- The double column is the preferred method for moving along an urban street. It provides 360 degrees of security and allows for overlapping coverage.

WINDOWS AND DOORS -- A common danger is passing by windows and doors without being aware. One technique is to pie off the opening. Using the near wall for cover, a pointman aims along the edge of the window or door while another soldier covers his back. Both soldiers cross the opening as the pointman pivots completing a 180 degree sweep of the opening.

URBAN BATTLEFIELD: PHYSICAL FEATURES The blend of horizontal and vertical geometry, and the variety of surfaces and spaces make urban areas vastly more complex than a similarly sized piece of natural terrain. Some of the dimensions:

- Airspace The area usable by aircraft and aerial munitions. It is broken up at low levels by manmade structures.
- Interior space The unseen battle space behind the exteriors.
- Exterior space The visible battle space.
- Supersurface areas The roofs, balconies, and upper floors that can be used for movement and advantage.
- Surface areas Streets, alleys, parks, fields that follow the natural terrain and are broken up by manmade features.
- Subsurface areas Sewers, drains, subway tunnels and other underground corridors that provide a concealed means of movement and engagement.

TARGET MARKING AND FRIENDLY POSITIONS Support from aircraft, artillery and other combat elements is critical in urban warfare, so locating and marking friendly positions and enemy targets is important. Soldiers can use a number of techniques to mark buildings, but the simplest methods are often best. Sometimes spray paint or bed sheets hung out of windows is enough. Flares, strobes, smoke and mirror signaling or even laser pointer devices might also be used.

CORNERS -- The urban landscape is full of corners, each a potential hazard. A technique called popping the corner puts the soldier near the ground, where enemy fire is less likely to hit. The weapon is short stocked (see weapon carrying techniques below) to hide the muzzle.

WALLS AND HOLES -- Walls may provide cover or present obstacles. They should be crossed by rolling quickly over the top, keeping a low silhouette. In urban warfare, doors should rarely be used. Soldiers must seek alternate ways to enter buildings.

EXPOSURES NEAR THE GROUND -- It can be easy to pass by basement windows or stairwells without noticing, exposing a soldier's legs to enemy fire. Staying close to the walls, soldiers must be careful to either step or jump over these low-lying hazards.

Ready to Fire The hallmarks of urban combat are the proximity of the enemy

(very close) and the amount of time a soldier has to react to an enemy action (very little). Soldiers are therefore trained to hold their weapons in ways that maximize reaction time while moving through city streets. At right, four basic weapons carries for urban combat. TACTICAL CARRYUSED: When an immediate threat is presentPermits control of the rifle while moving; still allows quick engagement. The stock is placed at hip level and the barrel is angled upward at 45 degrees. ALERT CARRYUSED: When enemy contact is likelyStock placed against shoulder; muzzle angled downward at 45 degrees. As needed, rifle is snapped into firing position with front sight post aligned on target. READY CARRYUSED: When enemy contact is imminent.Stock placed against shoulder; muzzle pointed outward in direction of enemy. Alignment of the front sight on the enemy is made as the shot is fired. SHORT STOCKINGUSED: In enclosed spaces or to conceal the muzzle.Stock is positioned above the shoulders, with hand guard near the cheek. The index finger or thumb is used to pull the trigger. In Beirut in the mid-1970s, by contrast, Palestinian and other Muslim forces fought Christian militias across a line of faiths whose incongruous initial markers were luxury seafront hotels -- the St. Georges and the Phoenicia, the Palm Beach and the Normandie, won and lost in room-to-room fighting.

'URBAN WARFARE TAKES LONGER'

"The allies are fighting with kid gloves on, but it'll be very difficult to keep it this clinical if urban warfare ensues," said Beal at Jane's Defence Weekly. "Urban warfare takes longer. It can bog down large numbers of troops. This war is being fought on a clock. And the longer it goes on, the more carnage is seen, the more difficult it is for the Bush administration to continue."

The pressure, therefore, could be to unleash a huge strike, despite the ostensible war aims of keeping civilian casualties and damage to a minimum.

"If such force were to be applied in the indiscriminate manner required of high-intensity urban warfare in Baghdad," Clonan said in Dublin, "military casualties would be eclipsed by the certain destruction of the Iraqi capital and the annihilation of its citizens."

In the region's recent history, there are some ominous parallels.

When Israeli troops invaded Lebanon in 1982, for instance, they evicted Yasser Arafat from Beirut, only to find him depicting his departure as a victory, validated simply by the same ability to survive superior force as Saddam Hussein displayed after the Persian Gulf war in 1991.

And, as the Economist magazine recalled last week, the Israelis' welcome was short-lived.

"When Israel invaded here in 1982 we met them with showers of rice and roses," a spokesman for Lebanon's Hezbollah Shiite Muslim militia was quoted as saying. "One hundred days later we blew up their headquarters."

FIGHTING IN THE STREETS

A coalition forces advance in Iraq, they are increasingly faced with the inevitability of fighting in cities. Urban combat poses specific challenges in communicating, travelling and isolating enemies from noncombatants. Tall buildings and underground tunnels stretch the dimensions of the combat zone and shorten the range of engagement, making warfare even more unpredictable.

EYE IN THE SKY (circle/square)

Satellites play a vital role in ground operations, transmitting reconnaissance photos and routing some voice communications and data transfers.

MOVEMENT (triangle)

Navigating a maze of unfamiliar streets and buildings

RISK (diamond)

Aspects of an urban area that present special dangers

INTELLIGENCE AND SURVEILLANCE (circle)

War can get uglier when soldiers take to city streets; Casualties sure to skyrocket when house-to-house combat renders precision high-tech weapons useless

Knowing the battlefield and the enemy

COMMUNICATIONS (square)

Co-ordination amid chaos

PREPARATION (circle/square)

Because urban combat zones are so complex and dynamic, excellent intelligence is critical

Strategists use intelligence to identify areas of interest, optimal corridors for movement and to assess potential threats.

Once the operations begins, command control must react to a constant flow of status reports from the field. A city's terrain can change quickly during a battle, with streets becoming impassable because of rubble or large crowds of civilians.

Soldiers are briefed on objectives before each mission.

TARGET RESTRICTIONS

Targeting is complicated by the proximity of restricted buildings, such as schools and places of worship.

HELICOPTERS (diamond/circle/triangle) used mainly for troop movement, surveillance and fire support, Vulnerable to rocket-propelled grenades. Tall objects on the ground, such as towers or telephone polls, can complicate low-altitude flying and landing.

SWEEPING BUILDINGS (triangle)

Rooftop entry allows any enemy personnel inside to be flushed out to the street, where they are vulnerable, rather than face a desperate standoff. Also, ground entrances are likely locations for booby traps.

TANK-INFANTRY CO-ORDINATION ( triangle/square)

Because tank crews have a limited field of vision, soldiers on foot act as eyes nd ears, directing movement and assigning targets. Forces must rely on nonverbal signals if radio communication is hindered by intense noise or other factors.

"HIGH" PRIORITY (square/circle)

Securing tall buildings can be useful for surveillance purposes and planting radio transmitters for wireless communications.

TANKS AND ARMOURED VEHICLES (triangle)

Stay close to one side fo the street when possible, providing cover for the opposite side.

BUILDINGS (diamond/square)

Pose several problems. They offer snipers concealed points from which to shoot. There is also a danger of falling debris or collapse. Areas of dense development can interfere with radio communications.

SMALLER ARMOURED VEHICLES (triangle)

Provide support on streets too narrow or too littered with rubble for tanks to pass.

War can get uglier when soldiers take to city streets; Casualties sure to skyrocket when house-to-house combat renders precision high-tech weapons useless

TANK POSITIONS (triangle)

Can be taken inside buildings to provide fire support from a protected location. tanks can also create smoke screens to conceal troop movements.

REAR TANKS (triangle)

Fill in to secure advancing positions. Increased distance from targets allows them to shoot higher than forward armour, since tanks' main guns have a limited trajectory.

UNDERGROUND TUNNELS (triangle/diamond/circle)

Offer concealed avenues for troop movement. Infrastructure for utilities such as water and electricity often is located underground.

GOING INSIDE

Forces only enter buildings when absolutely necessary because of the danger it entails. An analysis should be done prior to entry, using whatever information is available. A building's material is relevant because its structural integrity can be compromised by the rigours of war. Floor plans with mobility corridors are valuable, but often unavailable.

Marking territory

Rooms and buildings are marked with tape, spray paint or chalk as they are cleared. markings point out safe entry points, dangerous areas or signal that medic is needed within.

Surprise entry

Buildings are cleared from the top down, when possible. If forces do enter at ground level, they might demolish a wall, rather than using a door or window.

Concealed risk

The threat of enemy fire penetrating walls, floors and ceilings heightens risk.
